Let the electors further remember that under them the trade barrier between Canada and England has steadily grown, and that we have only the promises of a reduction. But why speak of it? They have never at tempted to keep their promises, and these conditional promises, made with the proviso that Britain taxes on foreign food stuff will be easily set aside, as England can never listen to such proposals. While Sir Charles is so strongly advocating imperial unity, out of the fairness of the people who have not the time or opporunities to consider this question intelligently, he should place before them the responsibilities they will be taking on themselves in becoming a governing part of the English scholars are fairer mind ed men than Canadian politicians, and Caldecott, the ablest exponent of this subject, has, in a few terse questions, given us just what would be expected of us if imperial federation were to become a fact. As Calde ott is an enthusiastic propagandist of this idea Sir Charles should carry his questions to the colonies about with him
