But how to obtain the bare necessities of life even is a question that puszles the brain of the millions of weary toilers of the earth, and it cannot be done under present social arrangecurse our civilization are removed, and this restriction on trade, called a national policy, in Canada, is one of them, 1706-Thomas Arthur Lally, founded not on the laws of nature, but on the false principles of political economy. We must have reveaue, of course, but to obtain it by a tax on trade may be a national policy, but is not a national principle worthy of a ivilized people, because by so doing you are drawing on the very source of ur social existence, striking right at the root of our growth and development, and violating natural laws whose revenge is swift and inevitable. I am not concerned at present about what to tax. Tax what you like, bachelors, or anything, except trade, then we would have some chance to live, prosper and secome rich and able to supply a revebe saved." You cannot be saved except nue, not from the source of our life, but from the super-abundance thereof. By the argument from design this earth is not an accident, but has been especially prepared for man's habitation, and man has been endowed by the Creator with the mental capacity to determine the various conditions which constitute his environment. Let us pursue this line of thought and study this question geographically and physically. During the ormation periods of the world's natural history when order was being evolved out of chaos, when the oceans and contineuts were assigned the permanent resting places, when soils were being deposited and climatic conditions fixed we find that all countries were not made No particular country was so arranged as to be able to become entirely independent of every other, If the national olicy had been the natural law each would have been so arranged; every sountry would have been pretty independent, self-sustaining, and thus would we all have become rich. When you look at this question of trade by the light the law written in the geological structure of the eternal, hills, what an absurdity restriction on trade becomes, about as absurd as the story of the old man who said his sons were so smart that if you shut them up in a barn logether they would get rich out of each ther trading coats. Think of the various products of the different countries of the world, which are the result of natural conditions, because of a difference in soil and climate. What one country prouces it would be impossible for another to produce, except by highly artificial means, and that would be out of the question from an economic standpoint. For instance, many of the products of the United States cannot be produced in Canada, and so of every other country of the world, because of natural laws. When you think of the various products of the different and distant countries, and then take into consideration men's appetites, their wants and their necessities wherever they may be found, north, south, east and west, you cannot help reaching the conclusion that men and nations should not only be permitted, but are actually compelled to trade with one another. We should always remember that from his primeval condition of barbarism to his present state of civilization man has advanced with slow and hesitating steps. He long abused his faculties by mistrusting his HELP WANTED - 100 LADIES AND neighbors and hating his brethren who happened to inhabit a foreign land. Thus | Box 107 South Framingham, Mass. I believe that civilized man the world over has now reached the development of a higher civilization when the commercial policy of every country should se adjusted in harmony with the natural law, a law which, if obeyed, would make of every ocean an open public highway. and of every river an unobstructed thoroughfare, and eventually link toprotherhood all the races of men.
