After Sweitzen had gone I anxiously looked for the return of my friend. One. two, three hours passed, and still he did as a parachute, and instead of being dashed not come. I remained up all night, but he to pieces he escaped unhurt. Perhaps this I took a long walk through the city to cool my fevered brain and was returning a youth, tried three times to shoot himself, to my room an hour or so later when some one burried up behind and tapped me on the shoulder. I turned and confronted a stranger in the plain garb of a peasant. "Beg your pardon," he said, "but might you be a student in the college yon?"

"Perhaps you might tell me, then, how quickest I can find a gentleman named Frederick Delorme?"

"It is my name," I exclaimed. "It's curious," returned the countryman, beginning to unbutton his coat, "that should have run upon the very gentleman I wanted. Well, at daylight this morning, just as I was coming out of my house, a

I siezed the letter, tore it open and read the following with feelings better imagined

Oct. II, 4 o'clock a. m. My DEAR FRIEND-Forgive me for paining your noble heart, for, ha ang once concealed from you my real design in declining to fight my adversary, I felt that honor demanded from me a proposition requiring at least as great a risk of life, if not of reputation. You remember you said you would permit the risk of life, providing character were not involved. I acted on this and wrote Bergner I would not fight him, but would decide by lot which of the two should put an end to his own existence. I followed his friend to his lodgings, and we speedily agreed to the terms. We drew lots, and it was my misfortune to be doomed. According to the compact, I am to die today before sunset in the little village of Neuf, 30 miles from the capital. You will probably find my body at the only inn the place contains.

I roused myself at length with the hope of being yet in time. to save my friend and darted off like a mad-Cane and Wickingham Ware at very man, leaving the countryman staring after ma. I hurried to the proper authorities and got permission to use the government post horses. In a few minutes more I was on the road to Neuf, the postilion urging the beasts forward at the extreme speed allewed by law. Fatal miscalculation! In my terrible anxiety to reach Neuf before my friend should put an end to himself, I overlooked the fact that, if living, my arrival in such a public manner would attract his attention and hasten him to the commission of the deed, since it was not his design or desire to have it prevented. On reaching the inn, with a thundering clatter that drew the whole village out to look at us, I leaped to the ground, seized the satonished landlord and demanded to know if there was a stranger from Berlin under his roof. "Yes!" he answered quickly, catching some of my excitement, "a handsome young man-a thief or robber, maybe-"Quick, quick;" I interrupted, "show me to his room!" We rushed away together. I espied an ax and seized it as I passed. On arriving at the room door and finding it fast, shouted:

"Jules, for the love of God do nothing rash! It is I-your friend, Delorme! Come to my arms and be saved!" "Frederick, farewell!" cried a tremulous voice in reply, and at the same moment I heard the report of a pistol With one blow of the ax I split down the door and rushed in. There lay my friend in the last quiver of life shot through the temple, -Cincinnati Post.

HIS QUESTION.

I was sented on a beach in the Bots de localogue, whither I had come to enjoy alone and uninterrupted a lovely October afternoon. The gray transparency of the Parisian atmosphere lent a wonderful glamour to the autumn hues, like filmy gauge over the face of some rich eastern beauty, and the seductive harmony of the colors acted like magic muste on the spirit. In the distance the bare trees looked like rague blue smoke against the pile sky. and near at hand the fallen leaves, damp in shadowed places or dry and crisp to the sun, showed all the shades from purple and rich copper to gray and gold.

My gaze was fastened upon the horizon, and I was completely wrapped in that peculiar sadness which exquisite harmony of any kind is apt to produce. Suddenly l heard close to my ear a voice of full, sweet

"Est-ee que ton cœur remplit la promesse de tes yeux?"—"Does your heart fulfill the promise of your eyes?' I turned and beheld sitting on the beach beside me a young man who was regarding my face with a strange and intense inter-

He was evidently a Frenchman. I should have known that, even if I had not noticed his beautiful, musical pronunciation. His eyes were almond shaped and very brilliant, owing to the bluish color of the whites and the profound black of the pupils, his complexion a rich olive, his features straight and chiseled/and above his sweet, almost chiffishly innocent mouth a soft dark down was visible. "Does your heart fulfill the promise of your eyes!" he repeated gravely, and as though the answer were of great impor-

"I will try-try to fulfill it." "That is the first falsehood you have spoken," he replied severely. "You know that you cannot fulfill it." "I will close my eyes myself forever." "Your eyes are stronger than you. Nothing but death can control them.

"And do you really wish to kill me?" asked, temporizing, while I looked about anxiously for some chance of escape. Deeper and deerer sank my spirit in those trans-lucent wells of darkness, searching, searching and not finding. Those brown waves were endowed with a Lethoan potency. I forgot my danger, the world, myself, everything. I was drowned in oblivion, seeking the source of those fottomless springs. I was aware of nothing that was going on around me, and so I did not notice the change that must gradually have come over the young Frenchman's face during our long, mutual gaze. His brown contracted, his features relaxed, his lips trembled, and the hand that held the dagger fell nerveless by his side. I saw nothing of this and was in another world until a sudden, shrill cry from him brought me back to consciousness "It is too late; I cannot," and he dropped my hand with a groan, bursting into tears.

"It is too late. I wished to save others, but I have only lost myself. I have gone too near the flame." "I arose as in a dream and walked slow ly down the path covered with yellow. rustling leaves.
