have been Ecumenical and Plenary Councils, there have been General Assemblies and Synods, but these meetings, great and representative as they undoubtedly were, had reference to the internal affairs of the church, and did not affect those who held the tenets of such faith. But how vastly different is this coming Parliament of Religions. All the historic faiths will be represented there, uniting in fraternal concord and deliberating on those subjects which have especially referred to man's life upon earth and his destiny in the great hereafter. It is a generally accepted theory that in all probability the world will be saved, as far as salvation goes, if we believe in the ideas of God in whom we are now developed, and it is along the lines of this that the representatives of the great faiths of the world have been invited to present testimony to their understanding of the divine plan.
