Like a man in such a bruised state it has its good days and its bad days. It is now hopeful and now despondent, and it is apt to have the blues, very blue now and then. To-day Cleveland expresses himself reassuringly and bravely for sound, honest money that will be worth its face value the world over, and the patient chirks up and actually smiles, but to-morrow Teller or Morgan or Dubois will rise to proves to himself that a dollar, worth sixty cents, is the best money in the

Don't go without a world providing you have enough of them and then there will be a relapse and the watchers will sit about the bed Such is the tragedy, for tragedy it is, not comedy, that is being enacted before the United States senate before the eyes of this intense sixty-five millions of people. It is not a question to-day of mono-metalism or of bimetalism, but of repeal of the Sherman silver law. That is the microbe that is playing the devil with the national finances; that is the hobgoblin which blears from the Atlantic to the Pacific, scaring the heart out of timid enterprise and making even sturdy push and his twin brother, daring, quake in their shoes. "Repeal the bill," that is the cry of the people. Repeal the bill and we will solve the question of ratios later, when we get on our feet again, but repeal the bill now and restore confidence. In answer to this great cry of over forty millions of earnest people, a handful of senators stand up and say, "You shall not have the bill repealed, we intend to establish bi-metalism in this country, and now is our only chance. We can talk till we can't wag our tongues, but you shall have no repeal." And the forty millions will be forced to wait the good pleasure or the break down of these few silver senators. There is no recourse under the sun. The only point that I have read which really looks as if they had got hold of per be so bad but they prove nothing the nucleus of an idea is the one made by Mill and his school of political economists, and which says : "That an increase of the quantity money raises prices and a diminution lowers them, is the most elementary proposition in the theory of currency. Now I would not be rash enough to dispute an elementary axiom in finance, for I don't know enough to even argue the question, but I do know, and every man of ordinary intelligence in this country knows, that the money will always drive from a country the better money, viz., that silver will drive out gold, and that if we had free coinage of silver in a short time Europe would drain us of all our gold and then we would find our securities dropping to the level of silver values. I think it is an "elementary proposition" that a silver country cannot hold its gold "and trade with a gold country on a gold basis." Theory is good enough in its way, but we who have seen gold scoot across the Atlantic in $10,000,000 blocks, as it did facts. Plenty of money in the market will raise prices. . The above report has been left with us In the quadrille of honor his excellency for publication, and we give it with the freedom with which we allow every one a right to a hearing, but we protest against being made the instrument of defending attacks upon the police or city officials while in the execution of th ir duties. Captain Andrews' conduct guests present, but very few journalists was indefensible, and it is a discredit to Kingston that both the clerk of the market and Sergt. Nesbitt have been unjustly assaulted. Men are appointed gious services in the jail on Sunday the Freemans, convicted of the killing of receive the support of the people. When struct the officials how can they expect those officials to perform their duty? Captain Andrews took a stand at a corner so crowded on Saturdays that people can scarcely pass. When asked to retire he said he had the acting mayor's permission, which statement Ald. McKelvey, the acting mayor, says is utterly unwarranted. A second time the clerk of the market asked him to move and was reused, and when, in the execution of his duty, he endeavored to force him to move he was struck by some person in sympathy with Andrews. Police Sergeant Nesbitt was called in and he asked Andrews COAT-MAKERS AT ONCE. Good men fit per to move, then endeavored to move him in accordance with his duty. Andrews got near enough to feel him and then struck him without warning, which was not manly, even if he is blind.
