A HARVARD STORY.

It was after midnight when he reached his room in Harvard Hall, and fishing out a key from his pocket he was about to open the door when he saw something white upon it.

Enter the apartment he dared not, so he wearily crossed the yard and climbed to the top of Thayer, where he had his lodgings.

It seemed an age before he could arouse his clam and get inside of a door once more. Then came the observations: "What are you doing, Harry, wandering around in that rig in this time of night?"

There was nothing to do but to make a dash for it, and this he did, his heart sympathizing as he warmed up to the denunciation of the blackguardly action of the tailor and exultated on his own unfortunate condition.

"Now, look here, Jack; you are almost a lawyer. What can I do?" "Well, come to bed now," replied Jack.

"I tried out, the unhappy fellow slept well into the morning, and when he awoke his conductor was gone. Buttoning his overcoat tightly up to his chin in order to hide the wide expanse of polished linen that covered his forehead, he went to the young sport's room, where he found the college yard and across it to a restaurant, where he managed to gulp down a cup of coffee and a roll without buttoning his overcoat, although the room was oppressively hot.

This experience convinced him that he must get a change of coats at least, and faintly hoping that Jack had succeeded in arranging for a new suit, he returned to Harvard Hall. There he rejoiced to find that the legal document was gone and the door was ajar. Probably Jack had planned a pleasant little surprise for him, so he gayly entered.

What he beheld surprised and pained him. A square built, determined looking fellow, with his feet on the center table and a cigar between his teeth, sat there regaling himself. Harry, who was the around that it was one of his choicest weeds that the stranger was smoking, and that it was not yet paid for. A bottle, a glass and some crackers testified to his visitor's complete and happy possession.

This was too much. The owner of the rooms was desperate. He decided he could throw the intruder out—at least he would try it. The other man, who he did not know, was a scamp at some other time, but now he was engaged on official business.

"I guess I wouldn't, young fellow," he explained. "I am a keeper, put in here by the school. You can't take anything away. See?" "But I've got to have another coat. I can't go out in this thing!" "Well, I don't know, but perhaps if you leave your suit on the table, and I'll be all right. Have a cigar?" thoughtfully suggested the new man.

"Boiling over with wrath, Harry hurried down stairs and began to hunt for funds. Along toward evening he turned up at the Pudding trail and radiant and immediately found Jack.

"I've got the money," he exclaimed. "Now, what must I do to get that fellow out?" "Pay it over to the creditor," was Jack's advice. "Maybe you can find him tonight. In Chelsea, I believe."

"The other fellows had been gathering around the talkers, and Harry, happy in the possession of the money that was to release him from his scrape, blurted out the whole story, keeping his eyes on the speaker every few minutes. "I tell you, I never knew before what it was to have friends when I needed them."

As the narrative progressed the listeners slowly winked at one another, and as Harry wound up with another burst of gratitude some one snickered, then everybody laughed with mirth, and slowly it dawned on the poor fellow that he had been tricked, and that his chain, the scolding he had set up at the game and conducted both sides of the case.

The $500, except enough for a jolly good dinner, was returned to the generous lender, who, but even the spread of the dinner, the mouths of the perpetrators of the joke, or else I never would have heard of it.—Boston Herald.

Colossal Recumbent Figure of Brick. One of the most curious colossal figures in the world is the recumbent Buddha in Pegu, which was discovered in 1861 accidentally by a British soldier who was exploring a jungle. It is built of brick and represents Buddha lying on his right side, with his left hand extended on his leg and one foot showing under his robe. His head is turned to the right, and his eyes are open, and his expression is benevolent and intelligent. Human beings standing on the ledge of rock which forms his couch look like men in front of a great building. The height of the recumbent is 70 feet and the length about 270. It is supposed to have been built in the fifteenth century. On the irrawaddy river below Pegu is a cliff two miles long and about 300 feet high, which is covered in rows of Buddha images of which are 30 feet high and in many cases richly gilded. Robert Doyle, a recent traveler in Burmah, describes the view of the city of Pegu from the river as "one of the grandest and most impressive sights he has ever seen." This old capital contains an enormous number of Buddhist temples of various sizes and styles of architecture.—Washington Times.

Pallas Sand Gravel Eggs. The egg of the Pallas sand grouse is usually quoted by dealers in natural history specimens at about 8c, but there are exceptions to this as to all other birds. It is an average size of 15 millimeters in length and not farther west than India until the year 1860, when a set was taken in England. The identity of both bird and egg was certain, and the eggs were sent with the bird. The first set of eggs was marked with the initials of each egg, but competition was so lively that they were two of two—were finally sold for $20, 100 times usual value.—The London Telegraph.

LIGHT AND ARMY.

October. The fall is falling. The birds are calling. They make it by away. The leaves are falling. The nights are still. The skies are dull and gray. The leaves are falling. With color burning. The forest is warm and bright. The frost is heavy. Her plans up every night. With partridge drumming. The time is coming. Without the slightest doubt. When every body. Pure gold or shoddy. Must get thick dunnets out.—Somerville Journal.

Confident. Mrs. E. engaged a "lady" six months in the country to do her cooking. One day in giving orders for the next breakfast Mrs. E. said: "We'll have stewed potatoes for breakfast, Ellen. Do you know how to cook them?" "Sure, ma'am, I do," said the girl confidently. "You fry 'em in the pan."

From Little Things. It commenced with a howl and a snarl. A formal polite "howdy do." A few moonlight glances at Belle's side. A blustering cranky canoe. A buggy that scarcely held two. A waist that was costly to spin. Soft eyes that were tenderly blue.—And that was the way it began!—Brooklyn Life.

Confession—and bills for awhile. The skies of a rosate hue. A sign which pointed at Belle's side. Then widely the wedding cards flew. Alas! if young Love only knew. The risks he undertakes to run. These little matters would be few.—But that was the way it began!—Brooklyn Life.

For Her Sake. "Clarice," he said in a voice that was full of emotion, "I lay my fortune at your feet. And," he muttered as an afterthought, "it is no slouch of a fortune either."

"The fortune is all right, but you are very young. It will be many years before I am a widow." "Clarice," and his emotion almost choked him, "that shall be no obstacle. For your sake, I will do anything."

"How can you overcome the difficulty." "I will (more emotion) I will smoke cigars, retort.—Washington Star.

Poker Terms. I asked her "age." She lifted "A pair" of deep blue eyes. And she took a card in her hand. That "raised me" to the skies.

"I saw her 'dash.' Her 'fall' she cried. In truly 'royal' mien. "Go ask your 'aunt' about Jack? 'You'll find I'm 'fifty eight.'"

Worse Still. Little Betty was in the dining room one day, and seeing a great number of very small ants crawling over the sideboard uttered a loud exclamation. "What's the matter with her mother from the next room. 'Are there more ants?"

"Not ants, exactly, I guess," answered Betty. "But millions of nephews and nieces."—Youth's Companion.

The Musical Girl. On pianos and organs she plays. Since Saturday and has mysteriously. And the watchman calls out. To see what she's about. As he goes on his night duty.—Chicago Gazette.

Cause and Effect. May-Don't you think that Miss G. is perfectly charming? "Indeed it struck me she was a little bit giddy."

May-Why, mamma, she moves in the best circles. "Mamma—that accounts for it. Moving in circles will make any one giddy.—New York Herald.

Foot Man. "Man wants but little here below." "But 'tis the fact that dante—He's sure to get a little less." "Than the little that he wants."—Washington Star.

Each More. "How was the prestidigitator last night, Harry?" "Wonderful! Why, actually, Pagan, that fellow took a dollar out of old Skinkin's ear!"

"Humph! It would have been more wonderful if he had succeeded in getting the out of Skinkin's pocket."—Harpers' Bazar.

One Thing Certain. The Duke of Devonshire was remarkably silent, went to London to negotiate a peace. "Have they sent the preliminaries of a treaty?" asked one Englishman of another. "I don't know yet," replied the other, "but they have sent the outline of an ambassador."—Youth's Companion.

The Arrival. A postage stamp on her hands. And fastened to the gum. A piece of cloth. She cried in gloe. "My new ball dress has come!"—Vogue.

True Economy. "So you have bought your wife another expensive ring. Isn't that a waste of money?" "On the contrary, it is true economy, for she won't require half so many pairs of gloves as formerly."—Elizabetanist.

That Old Song. The autumn song has come again. The song we heard of yore. It thrills with pain, that will refrain. "Dad blame it! Shut the door!"—Washington Star.

Made to Order. Mr. Softy—Miss Nimbletoes has a lovely figure. Miss Trivler—Yes, it is indeed new.—Truth.

Indifferent. We often have a hard game to find my wife a hard game. I can't get a hard game. To find my wife a hard game.—Boston Transcript.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment. Influenza, coughs and colds, by diseases of the throat and chest, so prevalent in our changeable climate, nothing so speedily relieves, or so certainly cures, as those instant remedies. These disorders are too often neglected as their commencement, or are indiscreetly treated, resulting in either case in disastrous consequences. It is therefore, the condition of the patient. Holloway's remedies will restore, if recovery is possible; they will retard the alarming symptoms till the blood is purified and nature consummated the cure, gradually restoring strength and vital nervous power. By persevering in the use of Holloway's preparations, tone is conferred on the stomach and frame generally. Thousands of persons have testified that by the use of these remedies, ailments they have been restored to health after every other means had failed.
