A CRUEL RUSE.

All Paris yet remembers the grief of Mme, de Sora when she lost her husband dehind the door hung with the heavy black prescribed by Parisian mourning there was a terrible despair of the Spanish type. The princess cut her hair, shut herself up and would see no one. Robed in her black gown, her pretty hend covered with a crape veti, she had the air of a young novice in a converst. She passed her days before her husband's portrait and dined alone in solitary state in the grand salon, where each night two plates were set at table. The cone and hat of the prince were put in the antechamber in their accustomed places as if the master, gone forever, would return presently. This remembrance in all her surroundings added to the despair of the poor woman and made the blank created by his absence more acutely felt. In the midst of the whirlwind of balls, visits, recepti as and concerts, where they had been favorite guests in their happy days, Mme, de Sora had kept but one friend, OLDBYHENRY WADE, KINGSTON the Countess Ancelin, a drawing room singer who, thanks to her beautiful voice, retained her intimacy with the princess. This great grief, so inconsolable, was irritated by noisy conversation, but was soothed by hearing singing near her. It aided her tears to flow and drowned her nobs. Two years passed thus. The widowhood was as sad, as austere, as ever, only now the hair was allowed to grow soft and fine. With the passing of time the mourning became, as it were, lightened by a ray of sunshine and seemed now and then an elegant caprice. It was at this time that the nephew of Mme. Ancelin met the princess at his aunt's house, fell in love with and dreamed of marrying ber. At the first word of love, which he endeavored to say to her, she became indignant. For her the prince still lived, and his offer of affection seemed an insult to him-a sort of infidelity. For some time she would not see her friend Mme. Ancelin. The young man left the city and tried to forget her, but he returned and exhibited so much love and despair Mme. Ancelin took pity upon him and resolved to vanquish the scruples of the princess. But how-how persuade that singular nature which never reasoned and lived in the midst of the enthusiasm of regret? The thought struck her that so exclusive a paszion would yield to jealousy, and therefore she bent ber energies to awaken the feeling in the breast of the princess. She determined to secure some old letters of the prince. This was not a very difficult thing to do, as in his bachelor days M. de Sora had written a good deal, and his delicate handwriting was disseminated among many dainty caskets. Mme, Ancelia procured one of these leaves of romance and had the to once more seek admittance to the princess' presence at that home more like a living tomb than a dwelling. She found the princess weeping before the portrait as usual and sadly showed her one of the letters. It was not a pain which she gave her; it was a thund boit! Poor little princesal Her grief, her touching widowhood, so full of loving memories, all gone, disappeared at once, at one moment, in an abyes of contempt and anger,

Nothing remained now but a desire to avenge herself. The portrait was exiled to the garret. The cane and hat also took flight. Once more the grand house was thrown open to the gay world, and the balls, suppers and receptions at the Hotel de Sora became the fetes of Paris. The princess, costumed in pearl gray, in soft ilac, then in rose and in blue, resumed her place in the world of fushion. One evening as she wandered through the glittering throng, accompanied by Mme. Ancelin's nephew, who followed her like her hadow, she said to him, "I will be your wife whenever you wish." She would have been willing to have married him on the

A short time afterward they were married, she with a sort of frenzied joy, he with a mind troubled and astonished at this violent, sudden passion, yet too happy to analyze the cause. The world spoke enthusiastically of the marriage. Mme. Ancelin, accustomed to romantic expressions, impresy to at ourse the worst had even a charming word to say. "Do you see the princess? You thought she wept, but she was only cooing. It was a dovelike widowhood."

Six months passed. The newly wedded pair were in the country at a chateau in the neighborhood of Paris. Mme. Ancelin came to visit them. In seeing them so happy walking tranquilly together in the garden among the flowers the charming countess, who was never able to see beyond the present moment, said: "And it is I who Lave created this happiness. Truly, I do not regret my little ruse. Ah, my dear, I can afford to tell you now. "What ruse? What falsehood?" replied the princess, with a rapid movement. "Ah! my dearest child, the poor prince was not so black as he was painted. That famous letter was five years old, written before you were married or had even met." "You have done this!" said the princest, and she looked at both her husband and his aunt with wild eyes. The dead prince had not betrayed her. It was she who was false she who had forgotten. His very name was discarded. He came to reproach her, in that moment and at once took his former place in her regard. Her husband saw in gesture that she wished to separate herself from him; it was all over between She shut herself up once more and retreated from the world and for eight days endured an agony more terrible than before, remorse being added to sorrow. The unhappy princess had remarried without love, actuated alone by revenge, and the prince having committed no fault she felt criminal toward him and shame toward herself. The poor husband knew there was no hope for him. The ancient passion had returned with redoubled force. She spoke coldly to bim, as if to a stranger, assuring him of her pardon, persuaded that he was not his aunt's accomplice. At the last moment, as Mme. Ancelin wept before her full of regret, though not comprehending her fault, the princess felt as though a butterfly had crossed her severe, straight path and said in a feeble voice: "You see, I do not coo, I die," and it was true.-Alphonse

An Aged Cathip Peddler Held Up by Feline Footpads.

Father Busch is an aged citizen of Brooklyn of vagrant proclivities who gains a precarious suisistence by peddling water preses, catolp and similar berbs. On a recent night the old man lingered in a saloon and expended the proceeds of his day's sales in nomforting beverages. Father Busch tarried long at the wine, and when t o'clock came he was thrust ignominiously forth into the night without a penny to pay for his lodging. Clutching his precious catnip in one hand, he wandered on and soon found himself in a maze of strange streets. The effects of his libations and the unfamiliar surroundings obfusticated the old man's not overstrong intellect, and what followed is thus graphically pictured by the New York Sun's reporter on the spot: Then a sound came out of the inky night which made old Father Busch tremble and clutch his package of catnip. It was the prolonged howl of a cat.

As he sat down on a doorstep an answering how! broke the stillness of the night. and soon the old man was staring at two pairs of green eyes which blazed throug' the darkness. "Scat out o' here!" he yelled, shying a stick at the blazing eyes, but there was no move on their part. The owners just whimpered and crawled around to windward of the catnip. Then they got the full odor of the pungent herb. Their whiskers stood out straight, they sniffed, and then both together let out a yowl which could be heard for blocks. That yowl must have meant catnip, for immediately afterward there was a wonderful echo of howls, yowls and meows from all sides.

With a great effort old Father Busch pulled himself together, stowed the catnip under his coat, buttoned it tight and start

THE STRUGGLE FOR THE CATRIP. ed off on a run. It was too much for him however, and he had not gone more than a dozen steps when he broke down and stag gered into a doorway. The cats were then before him-not two, but 20. They were an assorted lot and included every known type of the domestic cat tribe. There were parlor pussies, kitchen tabbies, cellar mousers. spiked fence crawlers, back yard bawlers. rattrap trailers, hallway howlers, yellow striped yowlers, breakfast growlers, and all were calling for catnip. Old Father Busch, despite his fright, re solved they should not have any of the cat nip, which he intended to sell for his breakfast. He clasped the herb to his bosom and kicked out yigorously. But the con gregation of cats was not to be bluffed by kicks. The cats surrounded Father Busch. and one gave him a vicious scratch. Still he would not let go of the catnip. By way of a sop to Cerberus, he picked out a little piece of catnip and threw it among the congregating cats. It was snapped us at a bite, and the hungry cats were at him for more. Then, as if they had it prearrang ed, all together made a rush at the prostrate old man. Such a sparling and scratching was never seen or heard before in Williamsburg. The cats struggled to get at the catnip, the old man kicked with his feet and struck out with his fista. As the cats were nimble, he did no harm. He finally found voice enough to cry for help. Policeman Young heard his appeal and surried to the rescue. He shooed the cats away with his night stick and lifted old

John Curtin, Jr., of San Francisco, who was nearly killed by an explosion of dynamite in his father's boarding house not long ago, thus describes the sensations of being blown up: "You see, it's so sudden. It's over just about the time you begin to understand that something is happening. You know, I had the satchel in my hand and had put it down. Then I got afraid of it All at once everything was light. I don't think I saw the flash. Anyway my face was not exactly toward the explosion.
