TOM'S THANKSGIVING.

When the congregation sang the grand chorus of "Praise God from whom all blemings flow " at the close of the Thanks had very much to be thankful for. - He was "warm" in this world's goods, and a big farm, sleek herds, fat granaries and money at interest made him notable among the rural folk of his native village. Yet even his wholesome piety could not withhold a deep sigh as his eyes scanned the empty places in the family pew. There were his son Will and his handsome wife, who had come home for the great feast of

Before morning Tom, who had sat sileptly with a gloomy face and kissed his mother over and over with un usual tenderness for good night, had gone away like a thief in the dark. It had come with something more than a brother's love, and in the light of that revelation her innocent heart uncaged its own shy secret, How could she even hint the fancy and the wretched blunder it bred to those she so dearly loved, whom it had perhaps bereaved of a son? She could only grieve in

Will, to divert his father's mind from s distressing subject, turned to Kate and said

"I suppose Seth Warner will be at the house to-night. When are you going to reward that poor fellow for his devotion? A squire faithful for a dozen years deserves some reward in these fickle times. I call that true love.

"Yes," said the farmer, "Seth has served for Kate almost as long as Jacob did for Rachel. He's one of the best young men in the village. I dunno what the church would do without him. Kate, burning with ourloaity, firthed in and out of the noom, for the culinary mysteries of a rural Thanksgiving are too sacred to be tampered with. Almost to the last moment the Thanksgiving house wife ministers in person at the alters where steam the fumes of savory victima. Poor Kate had been sadly divided between the voice of the stranger and the claims of the huge turkey sputtering on the spit before the fire. At last everything was ready, and she darted to her room to change her gown. Who does not recall the homely glories of a country Thanksgiving feast-the golden brown turkey proudly lying in state and recking with the most delicious odors; the roast ducks bursting with their own fatness, as if eager to be eaten; the chicken pasty, within whose ample bowels the most delicious tidbits quiver in their own jelly; the luscious home cured ham, checkered with islands of pepper and spice; the splendors of pumpkin pie, yellow as good and piquant with a flavor which Apicius would have loved, and the mine of mineed dainties hidden beneath a flaky crust These have been embalmed in song and story, entombed in countless memories and countless stomachs. Bottles of cider flanked the profusion of good things on Farmer Ashford's table. Will had brought down a case of champagne, but his father shook his head and said, "I tell ye, son, these Frenchified things ain't half as good as my old Newtown pippin elder."

As they stood around the smoking feast to my right always remains empty for Tom. Would he were now here to fill it, and mebbe he will before long." The stranger looked about the table at each one, longest at the mother of the house. He was trembling like a little child. With a mighty voice, struggling with its sobs, he exclaimed:

the old mad said to the guest: "That place

"Then let it be no longer empty," and tearing off the shock wig from his head, "Mother, father, Kate, Will, don't you know me? I'm home again, thank God!" One may well drop a veil over the scene. We suspect the turkey got a little cold, but what mattered that, for there are feasts of the heart richer than any food for the body. Yet later on Father Ashford did confide to Tom: "This farm has fattened many a fine bird, but I do think I never raised so tasty a gobbler before. That there turkey couldn't 'a' been beat on the

After dinner Tom sat for a long time by his mother's chair; she fondling his hand to Kate afterward that Tom had loved her as if he were a baby, he telling them about life in the wild west. Often a look of pain crossed his brow, and many a thing he touched but lightly. At least so Will's wife fancied. That astute lady whispered to her spouse, "I'm sare there's something between my new found brother and Kate." 'D'ye think so?" with a lift of his eyebrows. "One can see it with half an eye, you goose!" and Mrs. Will crossed the

'Dear mother," said she, "you're just tired to death with excitement and need rest." This was indeed true, though the thirst of that maternal heart craved still deeper drafts of Tom, and the latter carried her up, faintly protesting, to her own room in his strong arms. The same diplomat beguiled the father away, and Tom and Kate were left to themselves.

"Kate, you're handsomer than ever, though I used to think you the prettiest girl in the place," and the suffused cheeks and brilliant eyes justified Tom's opinion. 'I choke here in the house. Come out under the apple trees." "Kate," as they stood under the bare limbs, "d'ye remember 'twas here I said almost my last words to you, mad boy that I was? Why didn't you marry Seth ?" "Because I never cared for him." "Never ?" said Tom. "He declared to me that you and he were plighted lovers, and that you didn't wish father and mother to know it at present-that he was breaking promise to tell even me."

"It was false, false," she said, with indignation. "How could such a thing be true when I-I"-breaking down and her eyes falling before the intense questioning of his own. "My God, is it-can it be?" Kate's figure trembled with a silent assent, and he lifted her from her fest and kissed her again and again on cheeks and lips. "And

I have lost years of pregions: life and love from that knave's wicked his!" "But Kate, my darling, I ought to have told you all about myself first, for I have not been a good man. I came out to confess to you what I could never tell that old sweet saint and my dear father. Hear
