The kidnaping of Ward Waterbury was an awkward imitation of the Charlie Ross crime, and his own consin, Charles E. Waterbury, is the chief criminal. Charles P. Waterbury is a well to do farmer living with his wife and two sons on Long Ridge, which extends from Fairfield county Conn., into Westchester county, N. His eight-year-old son started to school one morning and disappeared. That night the consin arrived with a paper which be said three men had delivered to him on the road. It was a demand for $6,000 ransom, coupled with a threat of the boy's deathsigned. "River Boys" and ending with this a great thing when he has completed the line, "Earth is our stopping place, hell is our home." The second morning thereafter the boy was at home again and a day later the three kidnapers were in prison.

The boy told a curious story. The men had met him on his way to school, induced him to go into the woods with them, kept him concealed that night, the next day

The inexperionced congressman thinks he has done Job of introducing a bill. To him that seems half the battle. He talks with obvious pride of "my bill," and in his mind's eye sees the happy day when that bill has been engrossed upon the statutes of his country. The experienced statesman knows better. He knows that about one bill out of twenty-five becomes a law, and that about twenty of the twenty-five are never heard of again after the introductory process. Three-fourths of the hills introduced by old members of congress at every session are simply old bills rehashed and revived, probably to meet the same sad fate which has been theirs too often before.
