It seems life to him had not been very pleasant, there being sufficient ups and downs the eigh it, according to his story, to send an universe man to the fusane asylum. His last wouble, however, occurred about six weeks ago when, upon getting up one morning, his wife appeared frantic with anger and said she was going to leave the house. The old man said his wife had been jealous ever since their marriage. He admitted that about thirty years ago she had reason to suspect him, but he claimed that the minute she complained of his conduct and familiarity with another woman he turned over a new leaf. He contended that the never had cause to be jealous since but still after attending to her wardrobe prepared The husband protested, but she was not to be deterred. She said she had dreamt the night before that she had lost her boots. Again he tried to persuade her that this was an ill-omen against going away. "But she would not listen to me," he continued the tears trickling down his face. "She left the curse of God on my head, she hoped that the curse of God would rest on me all the days of my life, haunt me in ail my and it was in answer to a letter from his brother at Verona, that he was now on his road
