Immediately twenty-one "good right hands" went down into twenty-one dirty breeches pockets, coming up a moment later grasping twenty-one murderous looking knives. There was the parrow, shiver inducing, marrow congealing stiletto; the murderous looking American bowie manufactured in Europe; the blunt-end nondescript manufactured from a sailor's sheath knife and the innocent appearing bread knife, as dangerous as the worst of them, with its keenly ground edges and finely drawn point. Most of the rows in the Italian quarter of the large cities of the United States which terminate seriously have knives prominently figuring in them. The Nose of Verenese. The threat "I'll put a head on you" one that nearly every man has beard either addressed to himself or to some one else. It is generally a challenge or invitation to combat, but now it gets a new and equally guarrelsome significance because of a row in the world of art. A few months ago, says a foreign corre spondent, several young ruffians broke the nose of the beautiful statue of Paul Veronese which adorns one of the principal squares of Verona. After a long consultation, the city fathers decided to call upon the sculpter, Romeo Cristani, to repair the damage. But the signor declined to that it would be beneath the dignity of a great sculptor to attempt to patch up the statue in such a manner. It would be necessary, he contended, to chisel a new head for the work of art at the cost of 19000 lire. The conneil did not feel inclined to pay this money, and made a contract with spother sculptor to repair the nose alone. Signer Cristani, enraged at the action of the aldermen, hastened to declare that he gottld not allow another man to touch the work which has made him famous. Up to the present time no one has cared to run the risk of getting his own nose placed in the condition of that of the statue. It is any rate, the ness of Paul Veropese promises to play an important part in the local listery of Verona for some time to come.
