She was nearly opposite port when struck by the gale. Both the schooner's anchors were dropped, but they faited to hold, and she went on the beach. The boat rocked so that the stone shifted from one side of the deck to the other, making it impossible to leave the cabine. She filled with water, and at one time it looked as if there was no hope of the crew's escape. The crew, consisting of seven men, the captain's wife and daughter and little son, were taken off by a tug about noon. The Guinair is an old boat and is valued at about $3,000. The storm was so great the tow line broke and the barges drifted ashore three miles below Oswego. Two of them are on a rock bottom and the others are fast in sand. If the wind blew as hard yesterday where the boats are as it did here there will not be much chance of saving them. The Chieftain arrived yesterday at Garden Island, and, after being loaded with a steam pump and wrecking apparatus, left for the relief of the barges. The barges are not insured.
