THE PRINCE'S WAGER.

(It is easier to get arrested for nothing than one would at first imagine; as is shown conclusively in this amusing story, which is translated by Sophie Earl from the French of Henri Paget.)

Toward the end of the second Empire, Prince Edmond de Karinval was one of the most brilliant frequenters of the Boulevard des Italiens.

Very blond, pale and slender, imperturbably phlegmatic,—a temperament touching zero,—with the aid of his enormous fortune he amused society by his freaks and fancies, even condescending occasionally to astound the populace.

One evening he gave a grand dinner at his own mansion; the cheer was exquisite, and the dessert was served in a whirl of gayety.

"Very well; let us wager," cried the prince suddenly, replying to a challenge from the opposite end of the table, "that without having stolen, murdered, injured my fellow-beings in any way; without having committed any sort of crime, broken any law or regulation, I get myself arrested, when I please and dragged to a station like a vagabond, a thief, an assassin!"

He spoke in an icy tone from which he never departed, even when making the most extraordinary statements or propositions, and his words cut clearly through the laughter and conversation. Every one turned toward him in surprise. During the silence which followed he added:

"I wager two thousand louis—who will take it up?"

There were wealthy men around the board, well used to heavy stakes; but the magnitude of the sum startled them. Before taking up the wager they wished to determine the conditions clearly.

"There is no double-meaning?—no play on words, or anything like that?" queried the fat Duke de Morvella.

"Not in the least," replied the prince; "I give you my word as a gentleman."

"But," suggested another, "you will probably proceed to do one of those actions which, without being classed as offences, yet arouse the police. As, for example, you will show yourself in public in such an extravagant or remarkable costume that you will be followed by a crowd of jeering urchins, and, to put a stop to the disorder, an officer will be obliged to conduct you to a station, where he will lend you less conspicuous attire."

"You are quite wrong," replied de Karinval; "for if I should get myself taken up for wearing some extraordinary costume, the officer would know very well that he had only to deal with an eccentric character, an oddity otherwise inoffensive. No; I tell you they will grasp me by the collar and drag me to the station, believing they are conducting a malefactor, while I shall be perfectly innocent of any fault or misdemeanor, transgressing or enactment."

"Well, then, how will you go about it?" exclaimed Gastambide, the banker, who was very nervous and excitable.

"Ah, that—is my secret! You can understand that if I told you that beforehand—"

"Of course!" interrupted Gastambide; but I have it now! You will tap a policeman on the shoulder saying: 'Old fellow, I'm your man. I have killed all my family in a moment of frenzy. Remorse is choking me. Take me up, old fellow, let the law do its worst!'"

They shouted with laughter. The idea of the Prince de Karinval tapping a policeman on the shoulder, calling him "old fellow" and begging relief from his remorse awoke the wildest merriment. The prince alone preserved his cool gravity. He explained quietly to the impetuous banker that his intention was not only to abstain from evil-doing, but even to avoid any words or actions capable of provoking his arrest. And he repeated:

"Who takes up the two thousand louis?"

"I do!" cried Gastambide with an exuberant gesture.

The next day, about seven o'clock in the evening, when the boulevards swarmed with people and the restaurants began to fill up, a shabby wretch made his way through the crowd with bent head and watchful gaze, picking up, here and there, the cigar-ends others threw away.

The man was still young, and had evidently fallen from a higher rank, to judge from the distinction of his pale, refined face, his patrician hands, his general bearing. Very tall and thin, he must have been an elegant figure in society. Now he was reduced—by what vice or misfortune?—to old shoes with broken elastics, down at the heel and patched on the toe; to trousers shiny at the knees, and frayed around the hems; to a wretched coat, faded and worn, which was buttoned to the throat to conceal the lack of linen. An old felt hat which looked as if it might have been fished from the rubbish-heap, slouched over his head, and perhaps to give himself the illusion of a shirt collar, or maybe under the influence of old habit, he had tied around his neck an old black silk cravat which looked as if it might have been worried by a family of playful puppies.

Still, it was evident that this unfortunate man was not discouraged or despairing, for in all his misery there was a certain care and cleanliness not usually apparent in men of his class.

As he passed before Vigneron, a restaurant then very fashionable, he stopped for a few seconds to look in at the clear windows with their guipure hangings, through which he could see the diners seated opposite to richly dressed ladies, and dividing their attentions between the exquisite viands and their fair companions. At that moment a gentleman and lady got out of a carriage, and entered the dining room. Through the open door the shabby man could see a centre-table laden with fruits and early vegetables, while toward him wafted that odor of repast, so disagreeable to those who have just dined, so delectable to the hungry.

He advanced, and before the door closed, entered and timidly placed himself at the first empty table.

But he was scarcely seated when the head-waiter, a very distinguished and stylish-looking individual, perceived him and hurried toward him with an expression of annoyance.

"What are you doing there, you?"

"Why," replied the unfortunate, pointing to the other guests, "I come to eat, like all these people."

He spoke so seriously that it was impossible to think he had been drinking. The head-waiter concluded that he must be weak-minded, and said sarcastically:

"You have mistaken the hour and the door, my good man; the soup-kitchen is around the corner, and the soup is dispensed in the morning." He shook his napkin at the intruder to chase him off, as one would a troublesome fly. His appearance certainly did not grace the establishment. But the other did not seem disposed to quit his place.

"I don't care much for soup," he answered, "and the food given out in the morning would not suit me."

The head-waiter was struck with the purity of his accent and the refinement of his tone. "This is no born vagabond," he thought; "it is some man of position, ruined by gambling."

"And, continued the shabby one, "there is no reason why you should not serve me a dinner when I am ready to pay for it. There—if you have any doubt—there is my pocket-book." He opened his old coat, and from an inside pocket drew out a pocket-book stuffed with banknotes. Selecting one, he handed it to the waiter.

"You may look at it closely; you will see it is not a counterfeit."

It was a note for a thousand francs; and there were at least fifty others in the purse, to judge from its volume. The waiter took it, and scrutinized it for several instants, with wide nostrils and meditative frown. Then abruptly raising his head, like a man who makes a prudent resolution, he returned the banknote to its owner.

The latter made a movement as if to rise, saying:

"Now if you refuse to serve me, I will go elsewhere."

But the head-waiter quickly begged him to remain.

"No, no—stay. Give your order." Then calling one of his subordinates, he pointed to the man. "Take this gentleman's order," adding rapidly in a low tone, "Do not lose sight of him. Do not let him go out." He presently disappeared.

Five minutes later, he returned, accompanied by a policeman.

All of the occupants of the restaurant had opened their eyes wide when the vagabond installed himself at the table, and had watched him since then with marked disapproval. No one doubted that it was upon whom the officer had come to seek, and every head was turned to see what was going to happen.

Sure enough, the officer went directly toward him. He continued to enjoy a savory slice without seeming to notice the sensation he had created. He even started, like one suddenly awakened, when the man in uniform touched his shoulder.

"Eh! What? Is anything the matter? He did not seem to understand.

They explained. Bank-notes for a thousand francs were not usually produced from such pockets as his. To have them he must have stolen them!

He defended himself energetically; but his protestations were in vain.

"I doubt it. If you can show a single paper or certificate of character!" observed the agent.

"It is true; I cannot. But probably none of these people present can immediately produce passports or proofs of identification."

"No certificates. You have at least a name. Come then, who are you?"

"I am the Prince Edmond de Karinval."

"Why not the King of England?" sneered the officer.

"England is governed by a queen," began the man.

"Enough, enough! no need for further explanations. Follow me!"

And grasping his shoulder with his large hand, the policeman forced him to rise and conducted him to the station.

The wager was won.

Then, from the lower end of the restaurant, the fat Duke de Morvella, the lively Gastambide, and the others, rose, followed, and interposed, explaining the adventure to the policeman.

He was so overcome with astonishment, so eager to apologize, and so confused, that, in his haste to bow them out, he thrust his cocked hat through a pane of glass, while bending low and murmuring indistinctly:

"Prince!——Prince!"

The Drain of Nitrogen.

The fertility of soil may be said to be practically determined by the amount it contains, in a condition available for the crops' needs, of certain substances, of which nitrogen is the most important from several points of view. In countries like our own, where an exhaustive system of husbandry has long been practised, it has been found necessary to maintain a heavy yield of crops, to restore, in the form of artificial manures, these fertilized ingredients. In the past the chief artificial manures which have been used for this purpose have been guano, bones, mineral phosphates, and nitrate of soda. Of these, guano has been nearly entirely used up, and unless new deposits are discovered—which seems extremely unlikely—it will ere long cease to be procurable. The supply of bones has also been largely diminished, although there is always a certain amount being annually rendered available for this purpose. It is many years ago since Baron Liebig wrote:

"England is robbing all other countries of the condition of their fertility. Already, in her eagerness for bones, she has turned up the battlefields of Leipsic, of Waterloo, and of the Crimea; already from the catacombs of Sicily she has carried away the skeletons of many successive generations. Annually she removes from the shores of other countries to her own the manurial equivalent of three millions and a half of men, whom she takes from us from the means of supporting, and squanders down her sewers to the sea. Like a vampire, she hangs upon the neck of Europe—nay, of the entire world! and sucks the heart blood from nations without a thought of justice toward, without a shadow of lasting advantage to herself."—Blackwood's Magazine.

All Flurried But Cyrus Field.

The cheerful and indomitable character of the late Cyrus Field is well illustrated in an incident related by a correspondent of The London Times. Only those, he says, who were on the Great Eastern on August 2, 1865, can have any idea of the "shock" which the sudden breaking of the Atlantic cable that day gave to those who were interested in the great undertaking that so far had progressed without impediment. Captain (now Sir) James Anderson, Mr. Thompson (now Lord Kelvin), Mr. Varley and the staff of electricians, the directors and their friends, all on board the great ship in fact, were so elated by success and so confident of the accomplishment of the work that the sudden cessation of the strain on the indicator and the cry that followed, "The cable is gone!" produced an effect not short of consternation on every one save one man—Cyrus Field. He rushed up on deck when the fatal announcement reached his ears in the saloon, made his way through the silent, despairing group astern who were gazing into the sea in which thousands of fathoms deep their hopes were buried, satisfied himself that the cable was broken beyond remedy, and then, calmly surveying his associates without a trace of agitation of his face, said, "Well, it's so. I must go down and prepare a new prospectus immediately. This thing is to be done," and stalked quietly back to his cabin, where he set to work to write out the proposal for a new cable ere the end of the other had well settled down in the Atlantic.

Disease Often Found in Cow's Milk.

The tendency of cow's milk to become acid is due to a fermentation induced by certain bacteria. This fermentation is always increased by the action of oxygen in the air, and therefore is very rapidly influenced when milk is exposed in shallow vessels, as is generally the case in dairies. Unclean vessels of any kind induce fermentation, because they generally contain the bacteria that always accompany dirt. Cow's milk often carries disease germs, the principal ones being those of tuberculosis, scarlet fever and typhoid fever.

These are stern facts, and should be carefully considered by every mother who values the life of her infant. Little ones fed on cow's milk during the summer time are liable to be cut off at any time by disease, especially in large towns and cities.

If the duty of the mother is to shield her babe from all danger, when it is necessary to feed it artificially. Mothers have now that celebrated Lactated Food which is so strongly recommended by medical men as the nearest approach to mother's milk. Its composition is pure, healthy and invigorating. It is made from the best products of nature, and is suited for the weakest digestion. The mothers of Canada who have used it, extol its virtues and recommend it to their friends. It can be said with truth, that Lactated Food saves babes' lives.

Bath Jottings.

BATH, Aug. 16.—The holiday season is drawing to a close and the ubiquitous small boy is counting the days and improving his arithmetic by calculating how much solid fun can be crowded into the square minute ere he must again go to school. Our school trustees have supplied us with two new teachers to fill the vacancies left by the departure of Miss Phippen and Mr Kayler. Miss Phippen leaves the toilsome task of teaching for the more pleasing one superintending domestic matters in a home of her own. The best wishes of the community follow her. Mr. Kayler is obliged to cease from teaching that he may finish his medical course at Queen's.

Wm. Savage, Kingston, has just finished his contract of painting the public school; his wife and daughter came with him and enjoyed a visit while the work was being done, and now the building with its new dress is ready for the patter of busy feet. The schr. Albacore is in port taking on pressed hay. She will take a hundred tons from here and another hundred from Adolphustown for the Toronto market. The str. Lorelei has been supplying for the Hero lately. Rev. Samuel Shibley, of Elginburg, is visiting his old home here.

Tweed Topics.

TWEED, Aug. 15.—The new mill will be ready for business in a few days. Dr. E. Pomeroy and wife, of Marmora, are visiting at his father's. P. K. Newton has been on the sick list for some time. Miss Elliott, Trenton, visiting Mr. and Mrs. S. Battam's. E. Brushey is braking on a C. P. R. train. The work on the new Methodist church is so far progressed that it is now ready for roofing. Engineer Curby is fast recovering from his recent injuries. His was a close call, indeed.

The Workmen from Napanee and other points are to have an excursion to Tweed on the 24th inst. John Robertson's building is going to be a mammoth affair. James Quinn's new building will be in keeping with the progressive spirit of the village. It is a two and half storey stone building with a brick front. Mrs. Hardy, mother of fireman Hardy, killed in the late collision, has purchased a house for $800, being part of the insurance money obtained through the death of her son.

A Cure for Constipation and Headache

Dr. Silas Lane, while in the Rocky mountains, discovered a root that when combined with other herbs, makes an easy and certain cure for constipation. It is in the form of dry roots and leaves, and is known as Lane's Family Medicine. It will cure sick headache. For the blood, liver and kidneys, and for clearing up the complexion it does wonders. Druggists sell it at 50c a package—enough for five weeks.

Westport Whispers.

WESTPORT, Aug. 16.—Fine weather has come again and the farmers are putting their grain in the barn. Miss Lawson has gone to Ogdensburg on a two weeks visit. Edward McCann's son, Andrew, when going to the cheese factory on Monday, was thrown off the waggon and broke his shoulder blade. Albert Scott, Rochester, is home on a visit. Fred Gorrell, Montreal, home for some time on a visit, returned on the 12th. The public school opened on the 15th. The separate school will be open on the 18th with the same staff of teachers. Mr. and Mrs. Delong, Cleveland, are visiting relations. Mrs. N. W. McKim and two boys are visiting at Murvale and Kingston.

Mrs. Ross Klingensmith, Duluth, Minn., is visiting her aunt and uncle, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Hagan, North Crosby. Samuel Whaley, an old and respected resident of this place, died on the 16th, from cancer in his mouth. Goods almost for nothing at Misses Harrington's, one chance in a life time.

Harvest Excursions.

The Bay of Quinte and Canadian Pacific railways will run three cheap excursions to north-west on Aug. 16th, 23rd and Sept. 6th. Deloraine, Nesbitt, Oxbow, Emerson, Moosomin and return, $28; Regina, Moosejaw, Yorkton and return, $30; Prince Albert, Calgary and return, $35; Edmonton and return, $40. Tickets good for forty days. KENNY'S HAIR RESTORER!

THE WONDER OF THE AGE

Prepared from a Prescription of a Celebrated East Indian Physician.

This preparation has no equal. It makes the hair grow on bald heads like magic, stimulates the scalp to healthy action, keeps the head beautiful and cool, removes dandruff, strengthens and prevents the hair falling out, keeps it soft and silky, and gives it a beautiful glossy appearance. Manufactured only by Sergt. Major J. Kenny, 3rd Battery Royal Artillery, 11 Waterloo Avenue,
