THE SOCIETY GIRL

THE STYLE OF THE NEW YORK MAIDEN OF TO-DAY.

Kept in Seclusion Until Eighteen and Trained by Experts-The Way ine is Brought Out-A Very Pretty Reception -Queen of the Feast.

Nearly a score of years have passed since Lawrence Oliphant pictured "the bouncers" of Irene Macgillicuddy's set. The type of the girl of to-day is simple almost to brusquerie in speech, given to athletic sports, connoissaur in horses and dogs, virtuoso in the use of fire-arms, laving out-of-door exercise in any shape, ambitious to be at home in literature, languages, art and must, one or all of them. One is tempted to wish to see in the maiden of our society some of the small coquetries of building womanhood; but no, she is as serious as a cherub, and rather painfully practical than the reverse. Until the age of eighteen she is brought up in comparative seclusion from the world in which her mother takes conspicuous part; she is trained by experts in every detail of the accomplishments specified. One is often ignorant of the existence of young girls in the houses of one's friends until by chance they are revealed at a matinee of the opera, sitting demurely in the family box, or at their summer homes, on horseback, or playing at tennis on the lawn. The Dencing Class, controlled by a bevy of matrons who carefully select the names sent out upon invitations to belong to it, is her training ground for polite society. At these classes, meeting in the afternoon or evening once a week, the mothers sit around the halls while the boys and girls go through the exact forms to be observed in the ball-room of the future. When the young person is ready to be introduced into society, the mother, as often as not, issues cards for a general afternoon reception of her friends. Gowned in simplest home dress, high at the throat and of pure white, the debutante stands beyond her mother at the chief entrance of the drawing room. Behind her, piled upon tables or the piano, is seen a veritable hectacomb of flowers sent in by friends to celebrate the hour. Each guest, after speaking to the mother or chaperone, is then mentioned by name to the debutante, who bows or curtaies as she has been taught to do. Later in the after noon, when the crowd thins out, the girl, surrounded by her particular set of friends, displays her flowers, her gown, her new ring or the string of pearls presented by a good papa. A dinner follows, at which her mother presides, and around which the same young people assemble. Here she is queen of the feast, and amid flowers and lights and music and kind words, no wonder that the vista of society seems to her like fairy land. From that day on she is rarely seen in public without her parents, or one of them, or a fitting substitute. —Ladies' Home
