Of course, Sir Charles did government, and did not see that its present policy was tending towards annexation, and that the very thing the tories seemed to oppose they favored because they supported the means that would surely bring it to pass. The wonder is (as a contemporary remarks) that Sir Charles Tupper dares to speak of Mr. Blake at all, since the two do not usually speak as they pass by, and the great liberal has declined to shake hands with Sir Knight under circumstances which made the incident exceedingly significant. But these conservative leaders are accustomed to eating leeks, and will do anything to win and hold the forces that give them power. Mr. Blake is not, however, to be captured by Tupper's flattery. He has been talked at in the nicest kind o way oft and many a time, and he has failed to be impressed, and has dealt the cringing foe blow after blow.
