ST JACOBS OIL

TRADE MARK

THE GREAT REMEDY FOR PAIN

WHAT IT WILL DO.

Relief.—In any climate, at any season, one or two applications of St. Jacobs Oil relieve pains and aches; often cure permanently. This is the average experience of ten years.

Cures.—The contents of a single bottle have cured extreme chronic cases in thousands of instances. Used according to directions, there is a cure in every bottle.

The Testimony.—Thousands of testimonials substantiate the above statements in the cure of all kinds of painful ailments.

The Seat.—A patient knows instinctively the seat of his injury, knows that what ever may be the origin of his ailment, its expression or development, painless aches and pains.

Pains and Aches may be classified briefly as those of the bones, the joints, the muscles and the nerves. They may be classified also as to their cause.

Treatment.—Rub the parts affected thoroughly with St. Jacobs Oil. Apply night and morning if necessary. Protect the body from draft and cold.

MARRIED FOR MONEY.

Annie Ernest, a poor young school teacher of New York City, committed the error of marrying for money. The old and wealthy Mr. Hargrave saw and desired her, and his subsequent bought her. Tired of the drudgery and routine of her daily duties, and loving nobody else, she easily convinced herself that marriage with the old millionaire was the sure road to luxury and happiness.

The wedding tour completed a short trip to Europe, and, upon their return, the ill-assorted pair went to a New England watering-place for the Summer. Mr. Hargrave idolized his young wife, and Annie, enthralled by the sudden grandeur of the luxury which surrounded her, was wrapped in excited, unnatural pleasure.

One afternoon Annie stood upon the balcony and looked out seaward. The wind touched her cheeks; they grew rosy and her eyes sparkled.

Looking down the path that led up from the beach she saw two men approaching. One was her husband, the other was a stranger. As they drew nearer the contrast between their personal appearance was most marked—a contrast exceedingly unfavorable to the doughty millionaire, whose sixty years had left their traces upon face and figure. The stranger was young, tall, straight and handsome—such a man as Annie had pictured as her ideal. As she gazed upon him a sudden repugnance to her husband was engendered—a sudden realization of their unfitness as man and wife.

Mr. Hargrave introduced the young man as "Philip Graham, the son of an old and respected friend."

"And I trust, Annie," he added, "that you may become good friends."

How little his injunction was needed subsequent events too truly proved. From the first moment of their meeting a sympathy of manner and conversation showed itself.

"I may, I hope, expect to see you at the ball to-night?" said Graham, as he pressed her hand at parting.

Annie had not intended to go, but she replied, "Yes, you will see me."

Two weeks of dancing, bathing, riding, and picnics passed, and every day found Annie and Philip Graham more or less in each other's company. All but the doting husband and themselves saw peril in it. Finally the climax was reached. Philip avowed his love, and Annie realized the misery of the life which she had taken upon herself.

Annie Hargrave was not the sort of a woman to take uncomplainingly to an unhappy lot. Where others of her sex would have crushed out the guilty love, she fed it by wild longings and vain regrets. Had Philip Graham proposed an elopement she would have gladly acquiesced; but he was too honorable or too cowardly for that, and she was too proud to broach such a subject. And so days of feverish excitement, pleasure and fear passed over the pair of lovers. How it was all to end neither questioned; but it did end by discovery.

Mr. Hargrave carefully shut the door one evening and sat down beside his wife. Graham had been obliged to go away for the day, and she was, consequently, dejected.

"Annie," said Mr. Hargrave, "I have something serious to say to you."

The wife tried to smile unconcernedly, but she was too frightened to speak, and he continued sternly, "I require you to answer one question. Have you a lover?"

Annie turned white and faint with guilty terror.

"Speak!" he exclaimed, rising and standing before her; "is not Philip Graham your lover?"

"Yes, she said, rising defiantly; "he is. You have discovered only the truth."

The insolence of her answer drove all pity from the outraged husband's breast.

"Then you shall no longer be a wife of mine," said he, in a low, determined voice; "my money shall no longer serve to adorn your beauty for the benefit of others. Leave this room and this house instantly."

Almost mad with shame, rage and excitement, Annie threw a light shawl around her shoulders, and left the room. Had she pleaded for forgiveness, Mr. Hargrave would, without doubt, have relented, for his love for her would have forgiven much.

She walked up and down on the beach in the moonlight, and tried to form some plan; but all her ideas seemed to centre in a hatred for the man who had driven her out to shame and disgrace. A burning thirst for vengeance seized her.

"I am an outcast," she thought; "the wealth for which I sold myself is torn from me, and only disgrace and shame are left, while he retains his money and casts me off. No"—and now her thoughts found voice in excited words—"it shall not be so. I will end both our lives, for he shall not live after disgracing me. I will kill him and myself—but how? Let me think—yes—I will steal back to the hotel, and into his room—the verandah window is never fastened—kill him; then return here and drown myself."

She planned with the subtle skill of a maniac, and, rising to her feet, stole cautiously back to the hotel. All was quiet, dark and gloomy. Cautiously opening the veranda window, she stepped into one of their suit of rooms, the one adjoining their sleeping apartment. The moon threw a glimmer of light into the apartment, dimly lighting it up, sufficiently to enable Annie to find a drawer in which she knew Mr. Hargrave usually left a knife. She found the weapon readily, and, with it in her grasp, stole towards the sleeping-room.

She had only taken a few steps when her feet touched some obstacle on the floor. Stooping down, she saw that it was her husband, lying unconscious. His face was white and his breath came faint and labored. He had fallen in an acute attack of heart disease, brought on by the excitement of the final scene with his wife.

Annie lit the gas and violently rang the bell. The servants came. Mr. Hargrave was lifted into his bed and medical aid was summoned, but it was all in vain. He died without returning to consciousness.

But, before his death, Annie's strength had given way, and the excitement threw her into a brain fever. When she emerged from unconsciousness—days afterwards—her husband had been buried. The true cause of his illness had, of course, not transpired.

Tempered by the fiery ordeal through which she had passed, her love for Graham came out purer, more rational and more womanly. As for him, knowing that blind love for himself had been the cause of her rashness, and equally blaming himself for the tragic result, he could but love her all the better now that she needed his strength and support.

After the lapse of a fitting period she was married to Philip Graham, and repentance has cleared away in a great degree the cloud of guilt which overhung the morning of their love.

No Words Wasted.

Briggs—A friend of mine got off a bright thing the other day. He called on a young lady who had a pet dog she was trying to make bark, but the dog wouldn't until finally she said, "Fido, if you will bark for me I'll kiss you." Then my friend spoke up and said: "I can bark pretty well myself."

Griggs—Ha, ha! What did the girl say?

Briggs—Nothing. She simply sent the dog away.

The well-trained dog went to the village butcher's and got the meat all right.

THE WORLD OF FASHION

A SHORT BUT INTERESTING CHAPTER ON SLEEVES.

They are all Important and Just Now Very Unique and Conspicuous—Lady's Riding Rig—Boots, Gloves, Corsets and Trousers.

Verily this season is the apotheosis of the dress sleeve completed. A few years ago this now important feature of the gown was a simple, close, unassuming little essential of the gown, like the gown or the bolero underneath the skirt. You could almost make it out of the fragments left after the gown was cut. It fitted the arm as close as the skirts now fit the hips, as close as the skin itself—yes, closer, for you can bend your arm in the skin, and you couldn't bend it in those sleeves. The fitting of those little sleeves was the bete noir of dressmakers and tailors, and required more time and patience than the shaping of the bodice itself. But gradually the sleeves loosened, its severe little buttoned wrist was relieved with a cuff or fold of trimming, and so it grew and broadened and heightened and lengthened until now the old order changes. You must plan your sleeve first, and out of the remnants fashion your skirt so skimpy and snug and close. As to the material, it may be anything from choicest lace and gauze to rich brocade, heavy with jewels, no matter what the gown is. I saw a plain rough gray wool on the avenue recently with sleeves of black gauze puffed over yellow silk. If you have an old close sleeve, cut it out of the arm-hole in some jagged, rough fashion, slash it and scallop it, and put in a great big puff of something as entirely different from it as possible. Then put two deep plaitings around it just below the elbow, a frill of lace at the wrist, and all the other girls will be trying to copy it as the work of cleverest of French modistes. Slit an old sleeve anywhere and let in a puff or ruffle or excrescence of any kind with any excuse for being, and you have distinctly a new sleeve.

Above are some of the pretty new models and revivals of old styles, but you cannot go amiss in following out the most erratic suggestions of your fancy. Just a word of advice: If you live on a small allowance, buy your sleeves first and then on the rest of the gown do your economizing, both in material and amount. The first essential of the stylish gown is a pair of sleeves, ample in proportion and elegant in substance.

Harper's Bazar says that the boots, corsets and trousers shown in the accompanying illustrations are "the latest in the riding line."

RIDING BOOT AND GAUNTLETS.

As to the corsets, the model is made of pink coutil, edged with lace, which is applied with the scallops down and has a narrow pink ribbon run in the heading. The trousers, which are indispensable with a modern riding habit, are made of heavy English tricot.

RIDING CORSET. RIDING TROUSERS.

In mourning it is not proper to wear black ostrich feathers. It is not proper to wear fringe of any sort. It is not proper to wear black velvet. It is not proper to wear blue-black materials. It is not proper to combine dull silk with wool: it must have crape. It is not proper to have too deep a border on your letter paper or visiting cards. It is not proper to wear a watch chain; a black silk guard should be assumed. It is not proper to wear diamonds in rings or in the ears. It is not proper to wear a nun's veiling veil in deep mourning, except when travelling. It is not proper to wear black lace. There is no such thing as mourning lace.

The latest veil is a spider mesh pattern with a tiny spider himself in velvet arranged as the beauty spot. Just remember, there is always a right and a wrong way to assume a veil. The right way is to have it well over the chin, drawn up slightly at the sides and fastened high up at the back.

Bengaline, soft silks and nun's veiling are much used for ball dresses for young people, care being exercised in making choice of material to select the paler tints, such as turquoise, coral, shrimp, ivory and heliotrope. Petunia, dahlia and sang de boeuf are also extremely modish.

Corsets are a real help in getting a dress fitted. A woman may be opposed to corsets on health principles, but for the sake of the work in hand let her don the stays. Without them it would tax the most consummate artiste to fit her.

The daintiest stockings to be worn by a bride are of fine white silk with a medallion of Valenciennes lace set in the instep, the design being one of orange, blossoms. They are as frail as the proverbial cobweb, however.

Pointed bangs are being relegated to the slums and the straight cut English bang is once again in fashion.

Whalebone is the dearest article in the "findings."

Moving Time.

Are you preparing to move? Do you want a new carpet? If you do go to the Stanbard Carpet House of R. McFaul, the largest variety of patterns, the best qualities, at the lowest prices, to choose from; curtain poles, complete, with brass trimmings for 25 cents; art blinds, with roller pull, etc., for 50 cents; 300 pairs of lace curtains, of which we have only one or two pairs of each pattern, at little more than half price; portieres and curtain material of every description at extremely low prices. Remember and try the Standard Carpet House of R. McFaul for your house furnishings.

One Dozen Bottles.

Of the best known Blood Remedy will not work such a change in a case of Catarrh as one package of Clark's Catarrh Cure. All the wise talk about Catarrh being a constitutional of blood disease depends entirely upon what the advertiser has to sell. If you have Catarrh in any form, try Clark's Catarrh Cure, and you need not take a cartload of it before any benefit is derived. Druggists keep it and recommend it. Price 50 cents.
