THE HUMAN TARPON part of the big fish. Mr. Wells wore a leather harness about his head, and the line was fastened to an evelet at the top of his head. He was to take his position at any part of the large swimming tankwhich is 75 feet long by 20 feet wide, and when time was called the angler was to en deavor to reel him within reach of a 6-foot gaff, held by an assistant. If the gaß touched any part of the swimmer's body within thirty minutes he lost the contest. The swimmer was not allowed to touch the line with his hands or to foul it with his arms or legs; neither was he permitted to touch the sides or bottom of the tank. About 300 members of the club witnessed the trial, and the result was a complete victory for the man fish. Again and agais did the angler "reel him in" as far as the middle of the tank, and as often did he de feat the swimmer's attempt to break the line by auddenly darting away when it was slack. At length the line snapped in two. Time, 28 minutes. It was the regulation tarpon rod.

How Adams Saved His Life. It was because of his extraordinary presence of mind that John Adams, of Tacoms recently escaped one of the most horrible of deaths. He is employed in a smelting works in that city. The other day a misstep caused him to fall into a pot of boiling metal, and in an instant he was im mersed to his armpits. As he fell he clutched the rim of the pot, and was thus enabled to quickly draw himself out. He then plunged into an adjoining pot of cold water. His hands were badly burned, but otherwise he had hardly a scar on hir The secret of his escape was that he wore heavy woolen underwear and outer clothing, and before it had burned through Adams was in the pot of cold water.
