More infatuated than ever, Colvin returned to Oakland, and with nim Maxwell, who used Colvin's infine

to get a position as stenographer. Colvin became editor and publisher of a small weekly called Current Comment. and in it published squibs on the Howells, the name being thinly disguised, and hints of a "sensational story" to come. Miss Anne reproached Maxwell for allowing Colvin to see her schoolgirl letters, and Maxwell replied that Colvin had broken open his desk and stolen them. Colvin heard this and became frantic, demanding an interview with Miss Howell to set himself right. Her father came instead, and with him Maxwell, who had planned the meeting. There was a quarrel and Howell
