...when he described two large barges filled with men approaching from the main land. "Ah! The Spaniards," he muttered.

He sat, almost motionless, gazing at the water. He was sure that the soldiers had got sight of him, then he suddenly rose and ran across the water...

Two more shots followed the first, and the Spaniards became enraged, for they felt sure the man was getting rid of some contraband cargo.

In vain they called him to desert, and when their firing ceased, they were obliged to retreat. The soldiers had received orders not to shoot to kill, but to drive the man from their mark as the bullets struck the water.

They had their effect, however, for Jose at once turned back and toward the shore. He was a man of noble bearing, and he carried an air of confidence which was not to be despised.

As the young man was relating the incidents which had befallen his party during the last twenty-four hours, loud cries were heard in the distance, and the soldiers in the boat were seen to be hurrying toward the shore.

It was indeed, the man and ammunition which the patriot was the means of saving from the Spaniards, and which he had hidden in the cave.

But as history has shown us, the insurgents were overwhelmed in number and forced to retreat and scatter in all directions.

...Cuban fell lifeless to the ground, his blood streaming from his forehead. The Spaniards were amazed at the feat, and the craft boat away for the mainland, taking an easterly direction.

It would give him but little time to be an actor in the fate of Jose Calvo, remarked Francisco. "Yes, and the other half of it would save him from our enemy, but I fear that ere this he has fallen a victim to our cruel mercenary foe."

It was with a light heart that the young man returned to the boat, and he was not long in entering the cabin, where he found the man who had taken him to the boat.
