How it Reads in Moscow.

The Moskovskiia Viedomosti, of Moscow, Russia, has a thrilling article on the persecution of Jews in Canada. It declares "many a riot has already broken out against the Jews in Montreal and Kingston, where the natives refuse to work with the children of Israel in the same factories. It is no doubt that British officials encourage these riots, and we find a proof of our assertion in the anti-Semitic articles of Sir Goldwin Smith, governor of the province of Toronto!"

THE WOMEN'S COLLEGE.

IT WAS FORMALLY OPENED ON WEDNESDAY NIGHT.

A Pleasant "At Home"—The Proportion of Doctors of the Two Sexes—Dr. K. N. Fenwick Talks About the Profession—The Pleasant After Speeches.

Last evening the lecture rooms of the Kingston women's medical college were crowded at the formal sessional opening. The interest of citizens is growing steadily. The students had decorated the neat rooms, so admirably adapted to college purposes, and the lady trustees had provided essentials for a pleasant "At Home."

Edw. J. B. Pense, vice-president, spoke gratefully of the continued favor accorded the school, by public sympathy and support and by the enthusiastic attachment of professors and students. In Canada, as in the States, women's colleges no longer required defence. There were 3,000 lady physicians in the union, and yet little danger threatened the male profession, for the numbers were still 33 to 1. The women find an active field in supplementing men's work. There were fifteen colleges for women's education in medicine. He appealed for continued help to Kingston's college, as a home institution having to fight the greater influence, through population, of two large Canadian cities. The advantages of trained nursing seen in results at the general hospital, which was besieged with applications from ladies anxious to enter the nursing school, showed there was an unsatisfied demand for the training of young women in care of the sick. Several classes in the college could be attended with that end in view for moderate fees. The college faculty would gladly welcome them. The safe return of Dr. Elizabeth Beattie, from India, was a great pleasure to all connected with the college; it was hoped her health would soon be reinstated, and that she would reach the eastern land again in safety for more of her noble work. No friend of missions could fail to be a friend of this college for medical missionaries (and it has sent forth several), were the most successful of workers in India and China. The earnestness with which women are supporting women's colleges was illustrated by a long list of recent benefactions, from Mrs. Baker's gift of $1,000,000 down to donations of $10,000. We had not the wealth of the United States but we could all do something.

Dr. Fenwick's Address.

Dr. K. N. Fenwick was the principal speaker. He said he would rather have sat quiet and listened to the eloquent utterances of some of his confreres than have stood to give advice or inspire enthusiasm in undertaking the noble profession they had decided to enter, while by breaking silence he had lost his best chance of being considered either wise or clever. He did not think it necessary to consider the subject, "Why women should study medicine?" Whether it is inconsistent with the natural instincts of womanhood; whether it demands the sacrifice of all that makes woman lovable; whether the natural love of gossip implanted in womankind militates against her retaining of patients; whether medical studies are unsuitable or incompatible with the modesty, tenderness and refinement which should be attributes of every true woman; whether lack of physical strength would be a bar to confidence and faith on the part of patients, or lastly whether even female patients do not naturally cling to the idea that men, by virtue of that tenderness in the bosom of all true men for women, would be certain to do better for them than one of their own sex, would be interesting questions for discussion but it is supposed they had considered them and were prepared to risk the future.

It has been thought that female medical education is a thing of but recent date. This if not so, for in all ages there have been women physicians. He then gave the names of women doctresses in ancient days beginning in the third century. The medical education of women was traced from the very earliest times to the present. The subject of female education is well summed up by Dr. Thomas as follows:

"The demand of our time is not that women may practice medicine, but that she should have every opportunity which that time offers her to prepare herself for the work. Many have doubted and upon excellent ground, the ability of woman to cope with man in this field of labor, for there is no resisting the evidences of history, that in spite of opportunities and incentives, female practitioners have failed in time past, not only to advance, but even to maintain the integrity of the art entrusted to their hands. The experience of the future may contradict that of the past, but even its doing so will offer no good reason for despising the lesson which the past has left on record. The opportunity which is now offered to women for retrieving what has been lost in former ages is certainly all that the most exacting of modern reformers could require."

The speaker then emphasized the fact that medicine was such a progressive science that they could never afford to cease to be students. Every year records some discovery in advance in their knowledge of the healing art; some new theory or method of treatment depending on that soon to yield the golden fruit for the good of humanity. They were all in the position of students, and the opening of the medical school is a pleasant link, as it were, in binding together the students of the past, the present and the future. It was to celebrate their initiation into the medical profession that they had gathered, and it is meet that this occasion should not be allowed to pass without giving them the assurance that they had friends to greet them, hands to help them, and willing hearts to serve them.

The profession they had chosen was a noble one. Human pain, suffering and disease, were the enemies they would be arrayed against and would endeavor to conquer. The profession of medicine, having for its end the good of mankind, knows nothing of national enmities of political strife, or of sectarian divisions. It has no misgivings about the honesty or justice of its clients' cause for it is cosmopolitan, and is freely dispensed to men of every country and party, and rank and religion or no religion. It is a most unselfish profession for the physician not only tries to cure disease but actually to prevent, and so indirectly lessens his own means of livelihood. He then pointed out how much physicians do without remuneration during their daily routine of work. Throughout the world they are teaching from door to door, the laws of healthy living, which are in a great part identical with the purest morality. He then contrasted the science and practice of medicine fifty years ago with that of the present time. It had passed through many vicissitudes. The speaker outlined its gradual growth and said that during the present century it made rapid strides, owing to brilliant discoveries in chemistry, which had thrown light on the functions of nutrition, respiration, animal heat, etc., and to the microscope. What has lifted up the character of the medical profession in the eyes of the community? Simply that the modern science of medicine is founded on evidence which is as plain to the understanding as any other science. Physicians are often called to fill the highest offices in the state, and often as family advisers. A modern novel is scarcely thought complete without a modern medical character. In closing the doctor said they had come for the purpose of acquiring a knowledge of the profession. The work before them was colossal, the field boundless, the effort must necessarily be limited. Those who had good general educations would ever after reap the advantages and no one could estimate too highly the benefit of an arts course. The subject of their study would be that wonderful thing, the human body. Here they would find a mechanism of intricate but perfect work, requisite contrivance, endless examples of measures adapted to ends, prospective expedients against future needs, compensations for inevitable disadvantages and direct provisions for happiness and enjoyment. In a very concise and clear way the speaker detailed the way students should pursue their studies in college.

The Final Addresses.

Rev. Dr. Grant commended Dr. Fenwick's address highly; it merited the liberal applause. What he said of a thorough course in arts prior to medical studies should be impressed on all students; Dr. Fenwick has followed that line himself and made post-graduate tours with benefit. The medical council had done a wise thing in insisting upon matriculation for medical students; he was not so sure that extension to five years of study was equally prudent. The new Carruthers science hall, the best in Canadian colleges, would be a benefit alike to medicine and arts here. When the students and graduates of Queen's spoke so determinedly that she should remain here he was more than ever persuaded this was a soil and a constituency fitted for her, and equally so for the worthy associate colleges surrounding her. It was a pleasure, therefore, to see the women's medical college rooted in the deep soil of generosity and favor. Next year's opening would require a larger hall. He said a gracious thing of the success of the lady students and of the noble position they had occupied and could occupy in England.

Dr. Lavell, first dean of the college, rejoiced at the successful opening of another session, over which fell only one shadow, the loss by death of a devoted trustee, Mrs. Macnee, whose generous help and interest would indeed be missed. To Miss Gildersleeve he gave much praise for enthusiastic help. Trustees, faculty and students he cheered by approving words. Dr. Fenwick's call for greater help from municipalities to health measures he applauded; it was the old fight of science against money and selfishness.

Dr. Dupuis spoke for the hospital branch of the faculty and as a warm friend of the college from its inception. He remembered how at one time women were scouted as to fitness to teach school, and knowing their triumph in that line he had faith in their future in medicine. They were so studious, so eager to succeed, that professors could not fail to help them all in their power.

Light refreshments were served and a pleasant hour was spent socially.

PETER SHARBOT.

prisoner's mother and wife he found the body of the child a short distance from the house and interred in about two and a half feet of soft soil. He took up the child and conveyed it to Sharbot Lake and placed it in an icehouse and watched day and night until the post-mortem examination was made. He did not see the child in its life time and could not identify it. He had a conversation with prisoner who said if he had to die for this crime he would die like a man.

Dr Henderson made a post mortem examination. "There was quite a swelling on one side of the head and when I took the clothes off, I found a bruise on one arm. The skull was fractured. The fracture extended three inches altogether. I removed the skull and found the brain flattened out. The stomach contained a frozen fluid which indicated to me the child must have taken food a short time before it died."

Mr. Deroche—"Did you see any signs of violence, doctor?"

Dr Henderson—"Oh yes, the bruise on the brain I would say was inflicted before death. It must have been a small instrument that struck the skull."

Cross examined by Mr. Smythe—"Putrifaction was not very marked."

Mr. Smythe—"How do you distinguish this fracture from a fracture that might have been inflicted after death."

Dr. Henderson—"In a case of fracture after death there would be no hemorrhage."

Levi Tryon had seen the child living with old Mrs. Sharbot. "I saw the child at one time closed up in a pantry under the stairs, the door was about eight inches open and old Mrs. Sharbot closed the door on the child. I was there on an errand when I seen the child locked up in the pantry."

Mr. Smythe—"I am not positive of the date, but it was about 1st of October of last year."

Dr. Mundell said—"I held the inquest and under my direction the post-mortem examination was held. I was not present at the post-mortem. I went down and saw the child, but I did not make any examination of the child. I asked the mother of the child and Mrs. Sharbot to go down and identify the child. The child was identified by them."

Mrs. Sharbot was recalled by Mr. Deroche and asked if she seen the child after death. "Did'nt you see Mat Joque up stairs after they brought him there?"

Mrs. Sharbot—"No, sir."

Jesse Shibley examined: "I am magistrate at Sharbot Lake. I saw the child after it was dead. I saw the child once before death. I know the prisoner and do not know anything against his character. He is a very industrious man and I never knew anything against him."

Judge—"As this ends the evidence for the crown I find no evidence implicating the prisoner, and we do not know whether the child was injured before or after death, and there is no evidence to show that the prisoner inflicted an injury. I acquit the prisoner."

The judge then called on Peter Sharbot and said: "The evidence is not sufficient for the jury to sit on your case. This child met its death by some injury and I hope you know nothing about how it came to its death. It is a singular thing that your step-child should meet its death by violence and you know nothing about it. If any one else was aware of this child's death you should warn the authorities and have justice dealt the assassin. You have been a hard working, industrious man in the past and I hope you will continue to bear the same character in the future and that you will see that nothing occurs in your family or in any place where you have any dealings. You are discharged."

Sharbot's wife was not permitted to testify. She had stated at the coroner's inquest that her husband had killed the boy.

AFTER THIRTY YEARS

Mrs. Scobell and Her Daughter Visiting Familiar Scenes Here.

Mrs. Scobell and her daughter, Mrs. Illingsworth, of Buffalo, N.Y., are visiting S. W. Scobell, Barrie street. Mrs. Scobell is the widow of a former Kingstonian, remembered by old residents as R. Scobell, jr., (brother of S. W.) who did business as a wharfinger and commission merchant on Ontario street, about midway between Princess and Queen streets, while his father, R. Scobell, sr., did business at and was the owner of Scobell's (now Folger's) wharf, at the foot of Brock street. Mrs. Scobell left Kingston with her husband more than forty years ago for Buffalo, where she has since resided. She has two sons and three daughters now living. Her residence is with her daughter and son-in-law, Mr. Illingsworth, one of Buffalo's prosperous citizens. She is pleased with her visit to her native city and has enjoyed many pleasant drives around it, and is gratified with its marked substantial improvement, so much of which is new to her. It is some thirty years since she was here. She visited Cataraqui cemetery, where so many of her old friends are resting, and was pleased with its beauty of location and the neatness and taste with which it is laid out. Mrs. Scobell is a sister of F. J. George.

PADDEN IS REMANDED.

HE IS THOUGHT TO BE INSANE BY MANY.

The Way He Conducted Himself in the Police Court—He Pleaded "Guilty" But Then Withdrew His Plea.—Sketch of the Eccentric Fellow.

Thomas Padden was brought before the magistrate, this morning, and charged with having shot James Lindsay with malice aforethought and with intent to murder.

Magistrate—"What do you say to the charge, Padden?"

Padden—"I want to be tried by a jury."

Magistrate—"Are you guilty?"

Padden—"I plead guilty. I shot him all right."

Magistrate—"If you plead guilty you cannot be tried by the jury. There will not be anything to try."

Padden—"Lindsay struck me with a pitchfork because I would not let him stick the fork into my little dog."

Magistrate—"You had better plead 'not guilty' if you want to be tried by a jury."

Mr. Lyons advised Padden to plead "not guilty."

Padden—"All right."

Magistrate—"I will commit you for trial at the next court of quarter sessions."

Mr. Snook contended that a murder case must be tried in a court of competent jurisdiction. The magistrate looked up the law and concluded he was all right, and committed Padden to the next court of quarter sessions. Padden was taken away.

By a further conversation with Mr. Snook the magistrate found he had acted wrong and called Padden back telling him he would remand him for eight days, and at the end of this time would hear evidence in the case.

The general impression is that Padden's mind is deranged. He looked wild this morning. He will be examined as to his sanity before the case is tried.

Yesterday morning Padden was acting strangely, driving his horse as fast as he could when there was no necessity for fast driving on his part. Since his wife died last winter he has become melancholy. He said to a friend the other day: "Since the death of my wife I have become reckless in thought, and I do not care what becomes of me. What have I to live for?"

After he was arrested yesterday he said he regretted he did not kill Lindsay.

Tom Padden, formerly president of the sailors' union, was born in Defrancombe, Devonshire, on Nov. 17th, 1827. His father was a wealthy landlord and owned two of the finest estates in that county. When Tom became a young man he was placed on the line ship St. George to serve an apprenticeship of five years, and during that time he made five trips around the world, passing both the Horn and the Cape of Good Hope. During his fifth year he was mate of the ship. He afterwards engaged on the line ship Southampton and made three trips to India on her, on each occasion visiting Calcutta. In 1853 he was captain of the Perseverance, which traded between New Zealand and Australia, after which he shipped as mate of the barque Wilhimena, which carried cargoes between the coast of Africa and Zululand. Padden was also mate of the ship Tharmutus, which sailed between Liverpool and New York. He came to this country about twenty-three years ago, and was on the T. B. Allen when she was run down by the Newsboy on Lake Huron. All hands were saved. The Allen lies where she went down to this day. He was also on the brig Elfenstein when she sunk at Marquette, and he was captain of the Adriatic, which traded between New York state and Lake Ontario ports. After being mate on the Chicago schooner Trowbridge he settled down in Kingston, having had an active seafaring life. About seven years ago he went to England to look after his father's estates, he having been notified that there was a chance of their coming into his possession. He was the eldest son of his father's second wife, and therefore would not become heir until the death of his half-brothers. It appears they passed away, but during their existence the estates became burdened and now strangers are located on them. He never realized anything. The estates are valuable and rent for high figures.

He has no children. He owns a house and lot on Division street.

Capt. Eccles, clerk at the Lake View hotel, heard the disturbance yesterday. He went to look in the room back of the bar and just stepped on the threshold when a bullet from Padden's revolver whizzed past his face. Before he could catch Padden he fired the shot which took effect on Lindsay. Eccles threw Padden down and took the revolver from him, or he would have followed Lindsay into the yard and put another bullet into him.

The commissioner looked up the law and finding it to be a fact Connell was discharged.
