Baroness Wartegy (Minnie Hauk) tells funny little custom-house story. One of the many trunks which she brought with her on the Servia this summer was devoted to shoes shoes red, and white, and black, and yellow, shoes of all sorts and conditions to meet the exigencies of her several stage characters, all made for her in Paris, all palpably fresh and new. The inspector very naturally looked at them askance, and notwithstanding the fact that Baroness Wartegg assured him she had no intention of establishing a shoe shop on this side of the water, refused to dismiss his suspicions. He argued; she protested. He advanced rates; she refused them. Finally he looked the stock over carefully and then said firmly: "They are all too small for you, madam." "But I will convince you that they are not," replied "the only Carmen,"

Every city on our seaboard, every town upon our lakes, has its club and its fleet. The discipline is above the average, the system excellent, the majority of the crews American and handy with oars and sails, the owners influential and ready to fraternize and learn from the academy graduates, and yet the navy, prior to the last twelve months, has done little to turn this pastime of the people into the channel of pa-

Several abortive attempts have been made, but have failed because leading vachtsmen were more intent on obtaining uniform and title for themselves than men or gunners for ships, while the navy was naturally jealous of these cabin seeking gentlemen, when what it needed was forecastle bands.

During the last year, however, a great change is noticeable in the relation between the service and the country at large. Recent naval literature deals less with for eign models for cruisers, and more with methods to Americanize our personnel Coincident with this awakened interest is larged navy and a revived merchant matherefore ripe for some organization looking toward the advancement of our ocean

While there is no nation which theoret ically carea more for its seafaring men than ours, it is doubtful if there is any people sailors. Unlike England, the United States is of continental magnitude, and the citizens of the west, while rivaling the inhabitants of the seaboard in their honor of the navy of the past, are totally ignorant of the details of a man-of-war or the life of its officers and crew. If the army and the militia are mutually helpful, bow much more does the navy need an intermediar to keep its record before the people!-J. W

Miller in Forum. Diogenes in Paris. Diogenes, looking in the street with a lantern for an honest man, had a sort of imitator in a wealthy citizen of Paris who died recently. Having a fortune of a hundred thousand dollars and no heirs, this man resolved to bequeath his money to some person who had proved to be perfecty honest without any motive of policy. He had retired from business, and spent his time in riding up and down Paris in omnibuses. He always stationed himself near the front part of the interior of the omnibus, where he would have an opportunity to pass up to the driver the fares of passengers and hand back the change. Prequently, when the change was of s character to admit it, he quietly slipped into it, after the driver had put it into his hand, a fifty centime piece—the equivalent of about a dime—and awaited the result. A Parisian newspaper asserts that the old man rode up and down the streets for a single passenger upon whom he had be-stowed the coin saw fit to restore it to the driver, from whom it was to be supposed it But at last, one day, when the elderly cynic had slipped his usual small silver piece into the change for a five franc piece, and passed it to a young working girl who had entered the omnibus, he was delighted to hear her say in a clear voice to the driver, "But, driver, you've given me fifty eight years, during all of which time not

The old man said nothing, but made in-quiries about the young lady, and having ascertained her name, family and circumstances, he made a will entirely unknown to her, bequeathing her all his property.

Lately he died and the young woman came into possession of her benefactor's fortune of a hundred thousand dollars-a large return, surely, for a restitution of The story is told as a true one, but if it
