A GRAY WOLF TAMED.

One of the Savage Breed of the Rocky Mountains Made a Domestic Pet.

A gray haired, eccentric looking man, known as "Uncle Davy," recently entered The Republican office in company with his pet wolf. Jack, as his master called him, is a fine specimen of the gray wolf, and weighs a little more than fifty pounds, is six months old, has the sharp nose peculiar to that animal, and carries his long, bushy tail hanging in a graceful curve. The thick, light gray hair, evenly distributed over his finely formed, fat body, gave him much the appearance of a well kept pet dog.

His actions are like those of a cur pup whose acquaintance with polite society is rather limited. Uncle Davy gave his history. Jack was found by his owner in Middle Park. Uncle Davy and his family were camping in the park, and, having occasion to go some distance from camp one bright afternoon, he was riding along on one of those patent animals, a burro, and accompanied by a greyhound. Suddenly he was startled by the savage yelp of a wolf and a cry of pain from his pet greyhound.

Urging his burro to the scene, and forgetting that he was unarmed, Uncle Davy found his dog in a serious position. An old she wolf, with her four cubs huddling closely under her, attacked the hound with her fore paws, striking him two sever blows on the head, and laying him out on the ground. Instantly the wild beast caught the side of the hound in her teeth and tore a piece of flesh from the poor canine,

The wolf then made an attack apon the man, and as she leaped toward him the frightened burro shied and Uncle Davy struck the attacking beast with his stiff brimmed hat. The blow was not of itself injurious, but the suddenness with which it was dealt so astonished the wolf that she ran away. Uncle Davy quickly appropriated one of the cubs, which was retreated. The little stranger was taken in at the camp and tenderly nursed until he had grown to sufficient age to comprehend his surroundings and associates. Then the process of instruction was begun, and he has shown himself an apt pupil in acquiring such tricks as dogs are taught. Kindness has been the ruling rod, and Jack, while he has learned many things, has never developed the least disposition to be ugly or savage. He possesses hene of the wicked tricks known to his kind, and his training has disputed the assertion that a gray welf cannot become a domesticated animal

While in the office his master put him through a course of performances which were surprising. He would lie down, roll over, sit up, take off his master's hat, and, funniest of all, would leap up, hug Uncle Davy with wolfish fervor and mischievously take off the old gentleman's spectacles.

Jack is a great pet, and his master would not part with him. He has been offered $200 for the animal, and says he would not take $500 for him. Every motion of Jack's is watched with smiling interest by Uncle Davy, who regards him as a wondrous treasure and a prodigy of intelligence. - Denver Republican.
