Climbing the Mountains Between Vienna and Venice-Sailing in Gondolas and Visiting the Magnificent Places of the Fine Borough. Drs. R. S. Anglin and W. H. Downing have had a most enjoyable time travelling on the continent. A recent letter from Rome is interesting "We left Vienna for Venice of an afternoon and after a run of some forty-five miles through a hilly, but uninteresting country, where the land looked more suitable for gravel pits than farming, we arrived at the town of Gloggnity the commence ment of the Semmering line of railway, considered one of the most interesting lines in Europe. The line runs down the north side of the valley, crosses to the other side by a large bridge viaduct 300 yards long and then commences the ascent up the south side by a trarrow road or ledge now running along the face of the mountain, then passing through some dark tunnel until it reaches Klamm with its half ruined, moss covered eastle standing on an abrupt rocky pinnacle, while far below one obtains a glimpse of a small village situated in a narrow gore with hardly room for its one street which runs along the centre, the houses being built against the tall cittle on either side. After a short stop at this station we continue our upward course, every now and again, as we darted in and out of short tunnels obtaining a hurried view of the grand scenery hundreds of feet in the valleys below until we reached Sem mering, some 2,884 feet above the level of the sea. From here we commenced a gradual descent through a picturesque pine-clad val ley and then on through another uninteresting section of country until towards evening, when for three miles we followed the River Mur through a deep and narrow gorge twisting in and out with scarcely room for the train to pass along while away below flowed the river ever ready to, give a cold reception to those unfortunate enough to be on the train when the slightest accident should happen. As we approached early in the morning the north shore of the Adriatic Sea the country looked more and more unsuitable for farming, in fact for miles it was nothing but one mass of limestone with not enough earth on it to raise a good hill of potatoes. In a short time we obtained our first view of the sea, with a bird's eye view of the city of Trieste on the opposite shore. Passing on a little further towards Italy we got out of the quarries and into a low lying section of the country where the soil was more fertile and from here on down to Venice we passed through rich valleys containing acres of vineyards and orchards.

"Along our route from Vienna we noticed that the favorite site for churches seemed to be on the summit of some high hill and the thought naturally suggested itself to our minds that if the churches of America were built on the same plan what a splendid ex cuse it would be for a large number of church members to spend the Sunday at home-or visiting friends. The same situation also seems to have been a favorite site for old castles with which Austria abounds. One in particular that we noticed was built on what looked ke a large splinter of rock standing out from the mountain, the walls of the castle looking as if they were a continuation of the sides of the rock. A large number of the country houses are one-story buildings with the plastered walls either whitewashed or colored a light blue or pink, having rich-looking thatched roofs extending two or three feet over the edges of the walls and looking very picturesque indeed. In Italy the women instead of carrying water to the house for washing, take the slothes to the river, and when passing a stream near any town one can see crowds of women on either bank engaged in washing the clothes in the river.

"Venice lies two and a half miles from the mainland in what we call the Lagoon, a shallow part of the Adriatic. The city is built on three large and one hundred and fourteen small islands formed by 250 canals and connected by 378 bridges. On our arrival there instead of taking cab as in other sities we took a gondola and sailed down the Grand canal to our pension. In fact there are no cabs there and some of the in habitants of Venice have never even seen a horse. The canals are the main highways but one cannot properly see the city without taking prolonged walks through the narrow and crowded streets. These streets are not any wider than our sidewalks and the majority of them are so narrow that by stretching out your arms you can touch the houses on either side. One evening during our visit here we, in company with two young Englishmen, engaged a gondola for an evening's sail upon the Grand canal. The palaces and hotels were all illuminated and as we floated up and down in company with dozens of other gondolas, listening to the singing of the different serenading parties, the scene was both very pleasant and novel and gave one a slight idea of the beauties of Venice during the height of its prosperity when the canals were crowded with gorgeously decorated barges filled with hand somely dressed women. The Gondola is something the shape of a large canoe with both ends decked over and a canopy or small cabin in the centre. The gondolier stands at the stern and propels the boat by one oar placed against a bent arm that is fixed at one side of the boat. It is surprising with what dexterity they can guide these boats in and out the small canal. When coming to a turn they give a peculiar cry and let any other gondolier that may be appeaching from the opposite direction know that another boat is coming that way. "One of the chief attractions of Venice consists in its being different from any other city in the world, in that you never hear the clatter of horses or carriages and are never bothered with dust. It has also a very fine plazza or square surrounded by handsome buildings such as St. Marco, built in the form of a Greek cross with five domes, adorned externally and internally with 500 columns of marble, -the vaulting being covered with mosaics representing different scenes from the old and new testament, such as the creation of the world, the fail of man, the deluge, and ethers too numerous too mention, covering in all an area of 45,790 square feet. Behind the high altar is a second altar with four spiral columns of alabaster said to have once belonged to the temple of Solomon. At the left of the altar is a stone said to be the one of which John the Baptist beheaded. Opposite St. Marthe isolated Campanile, a 322 feet high from which a fine view of the city, the Lagoon, the Adriatic and the Alps in the distance may be obtained. Between the N.Y.; J. E. Snider, Toronto; H. Russer, the ocean on the fence to dry, put the sky to the fastest time this trip has ever been made church and the grand canal is the magnificent palace of the Doges, at the back of which is the aucient prison, connected by a stone bridge over the small canal and known as the bridge of Sighs, owing to the fact that prisoners condemned to death obtained their last view of the heavens when passing over this bridge. In the large square facing Sc. Marco's hundreds of pigeous are fed daily at 2 p.m., and tradition has it that this is owing to the fact that during the siege of Candia in the 13th century the Venetian by means of carrier pigeons which greatly facilitated its conquest. He then despatch. ed the birds to Venice with the news of his success, since which time they have been carefully tended and highly revered by the

"The trip from Venice to Florence we made during the night so that we had not the opportunity of seeing the country which is very mountainous, and, as we were, inform-not very interesting. "Florence, entitled "la bella," is situated on both banks of the Arno, in a charming valley, enclosed by part of the Appenines, and surrounded by handsome drives and parks. A certain writer in referring to Florence said, 'Who can describe the enchanting view of this art city of Tuscany and the world? Like a water lily rising on the mirror of the lake, so rests on this lovely ground the still more lovely Florence with its everlasting works and its inexhaustible riches.' It was in Florence Dante lived and wrote his 'Divine Comedy,' it was here Michael Angele, Raphael and Leonardo, it may be said, finished their studies, and on all sides one can see the works of these great men. The cityabounds in places of interest, among which the following are a few we visited: The Palazzo Vecchio, a cattle like building with huge projecting battlements, formerly the seat of the government of the republic and now used as a town hall. At the right corner of this building is the Great Fountain with Neptune and Tritons, a splendid piece of art erected on the site where three monks were burned to death in May 1498. At the other side of the square is the Leggia dei Lanzi, an open vaulted hall, of the style formerly built so that the inmates might participate in public demonstrations without being obliged to descend to the street, and at the same time enjoy the air, contain ing numerous groups of marble statuary Near this square is the Galleria deggli Uffiza, containing numerous paintings by Raphael, Titian and other celebrated painters. Among the churches the cathedral is one of the finest. It is built in what is known as Italian Gothic style of different colored carved marble 1851 yards long by 114 yards wide, with a dome 300 feet in height. Facing the cathedral is the Battistero, originally the cathedral of Florence, an octagonal structure with three very celebrated bronze doors, representing different scenes from scripture. Michael Angelo pronounced the third one of these doors as worthy of forming the entrance to paradise. The church of St. Croce is another handsome edifice. It contains the tomb of M. Angelo and a monument to Dante, both very fine. At the side of the church is the cloisters where the tribunal of the inquisition once held three sittings. In Piazza della Madonna is situated the New Sacresty, built by M. Angelo for Pope Clement. It is a quadrangular edifice and contains two tombs by this great sculp tor. Joining this is the Chapel of the Princes, octagonal in form and gorgeously decorated with marble and valuable mosaics in stone, over £800,000 being expended in its construction.

"Before leaving Florence we visited the house in which Dante was born, some of the parks and boulevards, and the Pitti palace, said to be the most imposing the world has ever seen.

REV. MR. CRAWFORD.

Resigns His Brockville Church to go to Church of Ascension, Hamilton. A large number of the congregation of Trinity church, Brockville, assembled Tuesday evening to close up its Easter vestry business, and also to hear a statement from the rector, who had accepted a call from the Church of Ascension in Hamilton. Mr. Crawford said he had three reasons for leaving a church which he had founded and a beloved congregation to whom he had ministered for fourteen years. In the first place he saw plainly from the financial condition of the church that its members could not afford to pay him the increased salary they had so generously and so freely voted him for the past year ; in the second place, even if the congregation were perfectly able to meet their engagements in this direction his salary would still be insufficient for his support, having now no private meome of his own, as formerly was the case, to supplement it; and in the third place he believed it to be his duty, under the providence of God, to accept the unsolicited call which had come to him from a new and larger field of ministerial labor. He would remain connected with Trinity church until the middle of June. By that time the bishop of the diocese would have returned from England and into his hands he would surrender his present charge.

At the close of the rector's address, during which there were few dry eyes in the large audience, a motion was made by J. McMullen, and seconded by Judge Rey nolds, expressing the deep regret of the congregation at parting from their beloved rector, which was unanimously carried.

BALL AT THE BARRACKS.

A Most Enjoyable Time at the Entertainment-Graciously Received.

Last night the colonel and officers of "A" battery entertained their friends at the Tete du Pont barracks. The ball opened at nine o'clock, the guests being graciously received by Mrs. Cotton. Never have we seen the element of genuine enjoyment enter more fully into the spirit of an entertainment than on this occasion, for the 'llving fleet" chased the glowing hours in a manner calculated even to inspire the toes of a Carthusian it such an one had put in an appearance. Our attention was specially attracted by the excellent manner in which the "Highland Schottische" was performed, as but a "select few" were capable of taking part in it all crush was avoided, and as we watched the dancers with their whirling limbs we could almost have imagined ourselves once more in the land of the "mountain dew."

In the "Lancers" several modern figures were introduced, to the unutterable distraction of the neophyte. One young gentieman, we observed, lost his partner midst the intricacies of the dance, and when we last saw him he was performing a sort of little "Lancers" all to himself in a corner of the room.

At half past twelve supper was announced, and the fact was at once made manifest that Terpsichore is capable of inspiring other sensations than the "tender passion," but if excuse be necessary for keenness of appetite the excellence of the supper affords that excuse, indeed it "required no ghost from the tomb" to tell us why all "flew at it like a priest, a shark, an alderman or pike.

In truth what we before asserted we now reiterate, namely, that we never attended a more whole souled or hearty entertainment. CAN THEY BE CONVICTED?

Did They Assist in the Fight by Watching it Only-A Case in Point.

In addressing the magistrate yesterday on behalf of the young men charged with aiding and assisting in cock fighting, Mr. McIntyre, Q. C., claimed that the mere presence of his clients at the fight was not sufficient to make them guilty of having aided and assisted the quarrel. He cited a case of a prize fight, between men in England. The spectators at the fight were convicted of assault. The decision of the judge was appealed, and the matter was sent to a court of judges, the majority of whom agreed that the fact of the spectators being present at a prize fight did not make them guilty of anything. The conviction was quashed. Mr. Britton admitted that there was a good deal of force in Mr. McIntyre's remarks, but the law in regard to cock fighting was very strict. The speaker contended that the presence of the young men at the fight was sufficient to prove that they had assisted or encouraged the affair.

The death of a beloved brother was a source of much grief and tended to affect her health more seriously. Other afflictions followed, culminating in her death. She was married to her bereaved husband about nine years ago. Three children are left, one an infant of three weeks. Much sympathy will be extended to Mr. Patterson as well as to Mr. Sherlock and family who have been sadly bereaved within the past few months.

AN EXCITED QUARTETTE.

CHARGED WITH FAILING TO REPORT A CONTAGIOUS CASE.

The Magistrate Stirs Up the Bile of Various Officers-He Says the Law is Not Fully Enforced And the Others Says it is-The Real Facts. A prominent physician was summoned before the police magistrate this morning to answer a charge preferred against him by Dr. Fee, medical health officer, for neglecting on or about April 23rd, to report a case of typhoid fever, causing the death of the person attended. The defendant contended that he had reported the case referred to on May 5th. He argued that it was utterly impossible for a physician to determine a case of typhoid fever in twenty-four hours. Mr. Agnew pointed out that it was the duty of defendant to report the nature of the disease as soon as it developed sufficient for him to do so.

The defendant said he was not sure until several days after the patient got sick that the disease was typhoid fever. He claimed that the worry and anxiety of the case made him forget to report it sooner than he did. He had, however, been faithful in reporting all the cases of contagious diseases that had come under his notice.

Mr. Agnew explained that typhoid fever was mentioned in the act as a contagious disease and should be reported as soon as

Dr. Fee stated that the defendant was the first offender in two years.

The magistrate said that he had heard that another physician had violated the law not long ago and had not been brought to

The magistrate then said: "I know that the health act has not been properly enforced, and I recommend that it be more carefully looked after in future. In view of this I cannot take any definite action with reference to defendant.

The mayor-"Your honour, allow me to say a few words ?"

The magistrate "Oh no, Mr. Mayor." The mayor addressed the court stating that the remarks which the magistrate had just made, that the law was not enforced, was not correct. Dr. Fee performed his duty faithfully and did everything in his power to enforce the law with regard to sanitary affairs.

Dr. Fee-"Hear, hear." The magistrate still maintained that the law was not strictly carried out. That portions of the statute requiring the medical health officer to placard houses containing persons afflicted with small-pox, cholera or whooping cough, was not enforced.

Dr. Fre said the board of health had to deal with that matter. He did not think it would be wise to carry into force that sec The Magistrate-"That's what I say.

You don't enforce the law in its entirety. If you carry it out in one particular you must do it in all cases

The city solicitor, mayor, Dr. Fee, and Mr. Gordon left the court room to day much disappointed over the result of the case

Rooster vs. Hawk.

An interesting bird quarrel took place in a yard near Wellington street, the other day. A rooster and a hawk met and fought desperately for a short time. The hawk was the victor. Mr. Avery, of Sharbott Lake, hearing about the fight, said that a hawk was e far hardier bird than a rooster. One day he saw a hawk carry off a chicken. A rooster saw the hawk leaving the yard with its prize, and followed it, flying about 20 feet in the air. It was unable to overtake the hawk.

He Saw the Elephant. Yesterday afternoon a farmer from Storrington, while very drunk, wandered down Montreal street to the lower G.T.R. depot. At Skelton's hill he slipped between the boardwalk and a stone walk and could not get out. His face was badly cut and blood ran freely from his wounds. A man who noticed the farmer's predicament reported the case to the police. Last evening Officer Craig went to see the farmer, but learned that he had been driven away by friends.
