His experiments in insupposed that Goose pond, a larger body ductive telegraphy were made on wires of water than Mud pond, had broken away, in which case the town of Lee would have been in danger. This alarm in Lee awoke the people in East Lee, and they, hearing the crashing and roaring of water and rocks, although three or four miles away, rushed from their homes, some half clad, others almost naked, but flying for their lives, and they were none too soon. The brook turns like a snake in the ravine on its way to the village three miles away, and it was here that the roaring commenced. On entering the town the first obstable encountered was a heavy iron and wooden bridge. Spectaturs who saw the wave as it advanced and struck the bridge say it was 20 ft. high and 60 ft. wide. It completely enveloped the bridge and carried it away.
