Ald. Gildersleeve thought the council had no right to limit the powers of the committee. They were appointed to consider the matter and he held that it was their duty to acquaint themselves with all the facts, so that they could properly judge as to the desirability of proceeding with the law suit. The council of one year was not bound by the action of another. For one he declined to be responsible for the acts of a previous council with which he had not been connected. The evidence in the committee's mind should be very clear before they urged the continuance, and Ald.
