BURNS. Yesterday was the anniversary of birthday From his rustic home in his power he came

And his step was bold and high. And all a poet's soul of flame Was burning in his eye. His fearless brow met the cold world's blast As a mountain peak rends the storm apart And a glance of careless contempt he cast On his feeble fees as he onward past In the pride of his dauntless heart.

The mountain lyre of his native land. That long had in silence lain. He seized, and with bold and fearless hand Woke its wildly and fervent strain thousand hearts beat quick and high As he pour'd the sad or the glowing song Soft love dews moistened the maiden's eye The youth deep breathed an answering sigh And the warrior's heart grew strong. But, alas! for Scotia's peasant bard.

o generous hand was stretched to save To ward stern ruin's crushing weight His proud heart burst ; on his quiet grave His own beloved daisies wave. And we mourn him all too late But where is the drop of Scottish blood That warms not at his name That pours not along its rushing flood Like a stream of living flame And far as Scotia's sons may stray

Where'er life's gay dream returns

And raise some sad, low, plaintive lay. To the memory of Burns.

Long will they hail his natal day.

Dark storm clouds o'er him hung.

Till mute was his tuneful tongue

On his devoted head beat hard.

The Warden's Suppor - A Fine Spread Free Tolls and Roads Again Discussed.

Forty-four gentlemen surrounded two long tables in Grimason's Hotel last evening, and for hours fairly enjoyed themselves. We never saw the 'groans (which some writers speak of in describ ing such events) taken so quickly out a table. The occasion was the supper tendered by the Warden elect to his Council and friends. Mrs. Grimason gave one of her finest spreads and to it ample justice was done. The best of good teeling existed between the city and county gentlemen, and in their discussions great harmony of thought was expressed. There is no doubt that the speeches made at the social board will result in benefit to both corporations.
