THE OHODEN E acts like a charm in Diarrhose, and is the only specific in Cholera THE ORODANE effectually cuts short all attacks of Epilepsy, Hysteria, Palpitation, and Amore; but----

That it leads directly away from Coole there cannot be the least doubt; and the little martyr treading the ground she would not, feels with an additional pang of disapdoes not carry with it the thrill of rapture that ought to suffuse her soul.

"Monica, who is that?" exclaims Kit, sud-denly, staring over the high bank, beside yond. Following her glance, Monica sees a crouching figure on the other side of this bank, but lower down, stealing cautiously noiselessly, toward them, as though bent on secret murder. A second glance betrays the fact that it is Terence, with-yes, most positively with a gun! "Where on earth did he get it!" says Kit; and, unable to contain her curiosity any longer, she scrambles up the bank, and calls "Terry, here we are! Come here! Where did you get it?" at the top of her fresh young lungs.

As she did so, a little gray object, hitherto unseen by her, springs from among some green stuffs, and, scudding across the fields into the woods of Coole beyond, is in a mo-

"The enemy's nephew?" asks Kit, in a thrilling tone, that bespeaks delight and a malicious expectation of breakers ahead. "Yes. I was talking to him yesterday, early in the day, at Madame O'Connor's: a gring "I'd have got out of it if I could; and then he began to talk about shooting, and in Coole. I told him I had no gun, so he offered to lend me one. I thought it was awfully jolly of him, considering I was an utter stranger, and that; but he looks a real good sort. He sent over the gun this morning by a boy, and I have had it hidden in the stable until now. I thought I'd never get out of that beastly garden this evening." "Oh, Terence; you shouldn't have taken the gun from him," says Monica, flushing. "Just think what Aunt Priscilla would say
