MONICA.

A LOVE STORY OF MODERN DAYS.

By the Author of "Mona Scott," "Aloisius," etc., etc.

"This speech pleases Monica, I think, even more than the ring. 'I am glad you did not go,' she says, softly. 'So am I—especially as—' Here he pauses, and then goes on again hurriedly. 'I had seen you as I left you,—interfered to others at least, if not wholly mine.' 'Why should I change?' 'Daring there are so many reasons.' He draws his breath, quick and impetuous. 'Some day, you may meet some one else more suited to you, perhaps, and—' 'I shall never do that,' she interrupts him slowly, but decidedly. 'You are sure?' 'Yes.' 'The answer in words perhaps is meager; but by looking into the depths of his soft eyes, she sees a sterner answer there, and is herself satisfied.' 'The shadows are growing longer and darker. 'I go down stairs and enter now into the room of my mother, says Monica, and she looks at the very signs of the fair Bella?' says Desmond, laughing. 'Refract, I beg of you, before it is too late.' 'After all,' says Monica, 'I don't think I have behaved very nicely to her. Don't think now it would be a pretty thing to make you give me the roses before her. No, you must not do that; and you must not manage to forget her, either. You must bring the handsomest you can find and give them to her,—but publicly, Brian, just as if there was nothing in it, you know.' 'There is nothing like offering to the strict truth,' says Brian. 'There shall be nothing in my roses, I promise you,—except perfume.' CHAPTER XIX. 'She's disgracefully ugly!—I saw her quite close,' says Mr. Kelly, in an injured tone. 'I wonder what on earth Madame O'Connor means by asking her here, where she can be nothing but a blot upon a perfect landscape; all the rest of us are so lovely.' 'It is four o'clock, and hopelessly wet. The rain is falling on the roof, and the grass and all the gardens are drowned in Nature's tears. There can be no lounging on sunny terraces, no delicious dreaming under shady beeches, this is not a day for giving in to the inevitable with a cheerful resignation worthy of record, they have all congregated in the grand old hall, one of the chief glories of Aglythill. Through a vague but mistaken notion that it will add to their comfort and make them cooler and more forgetful of—or at least more indifferent to—the summer heat, they have had an enormous fire of pine logs kindled upon the hearth. When too late, they discover it to be a discomfort; but with a stolidness which is their cause, they decline to acknowledge their error, and stand in groups round the aggressive logs, pretending to enjoy them, but in reality drying off heat. Meanwhile, the fragrant pieces of pine roar and crackle merrily, throwing shadows up the huge chimney, and casting bright gleams of light upon the exquisite oaken chairs and tables, and the richly patterned cushions of the sofa. The fire is now blackened by age and beautiful beyond description. 'Oiga, in a sage-green gown, is lying back listlessly in a deep arm-chair; she has placed an elbow on either arm of it, and has brought her fingers so far toward each other that their tips touch. Her hair is a mass of copper-red is knitting languidly a little silk sock for the child nursing silently at her knee. Monica, in plain white Indian muslin, is doing nothing, unless smiling now and then at Brian Desmond, who is lying on a beanbag rug, looking supremely happy and at full of life and spirit. He has come over from Oole very early, being generously urged so to do by Madame O'Connor when parting with his last night. Hyde is not in the hall, so the day is his. Miss Fitzgerald is looking rather handsome, in a dress of the very finest check, that is meant for a small woman only, or a child, and so makes her appear, in fact, as larger than she really is. Uie Ronayne, standing leaning against the chimney-piece as close to Oiga as circumstances will permit, is silent to a family, and indeed, to one but Mr. Kelly has succumbed to the damp depression of the air. They have had only one distraction all day,—the arrival of another distant cousin of their hostess, who has been landing her for a week or so. On inspection she proves to be a girl of nineteen, decidedly unprepossessing in appearance,—in fact, as Mr. Murphy, the butler, says to Mrs. Collins, the housekeeper, 'as ugly as if she was a spoke.' 'As a girl possessed by freckles and with half of a deep well, let us emulate our little French neighbors and call it blond argent. 'Who is she?' asks Lord Rossmoyne, who arrived about an hour ago, in Uie Ronayne's disconcerted. 'She's a fraud,' says Mr. Kelly, indignantly. 'A swindle! Madame assured us, last night, that she was a charming girl, and to turn all heads and storm all hearts; and to-day, when we rushed in a body to the window and flattered our noses against the pane to see her, there she is, a creature with red hair and pimpled nose.' 'No, no, freckled, my dear Oona,' interrupts Oiga, indignantly. 'It is all the same at a distance! general effect falls in both cases,' says Mr. Kelly, airily. 'It makes one positively uncomfortable to look at her. I consider her being thrust upon us in this manner a deliberate insult. I think if she continues I shall leave.' 'Oh, don't,' says Desmond, in a tone of agonized entreaty. 'How should we man age to get on without you?' 'Badly, badly, I know that,' regretfully. 'But it is a question of breaking either your hearts or mine. Some of us must go to the wall; it would be unfair to the world to make it me.' 'I don't believe you will go far,' says Mrs. Herick, slowly. Kelly glances at her quickly, but she does not lift her eyes from a little sock, and her fingers never rapidly, easily as ever. 'London or Paris,' he says. '—the city of fog or the city of frogs. I don't know which I prefer.' 'Better stay where you are,' says Brian. 'Well, I really don't think her so very plain,' says Bella Fitzgerald, who thinks it pretty to say the kind things always. 'A large mouth is an affliction, certainly; and as for her complexion,—but really, after all, it is better to see it as it is than painted and powdered, as one sees other people.' 'This is a fair, but not a good, creature with red hair and pimpled nose,' says Mrs. Herick, who has been kneeling. 'I think a little artificial light might improve poor Miss Brown,' says Herala Herick. Miss Brown is the new arrival. 'I don't think it is an admirable thing to cheat the public,' she says. 'I think Miss Fitzgerald, deignedly, 'nobody responsible would do it. To cheat the public and powder.' 'Do they know you know, dear?' asks Oiga Bobun, sweetly. 'It contains nothing about him, nor does it contain any of the most delicate and delicate details with perfect safety. Its great advantage is that it is not only safe, but it is also safe. It is adapted to the wants of the kitchen, has selected capacious imitations of its name and appearance. Beware of such. No additions or variations from the simple name: COOK'S FRIEND IN GRINDING. Trade Mark on Every Package 5th Oct.
