THE BREAD-WINNERS. A SOCIAL STUDY. 'What will become of that beautiful girl? She cannot hold out forever against the universal custom. She will be led by her friends and pushed by her mother, until she drops to the level of the vulgar, and becomes a rampant flirt; she will go to parties with young Murray, and to church with young Smevel. I shall see her tramping the streets with one, and waiting all night with another, and sitting on the stairs with a third. She is too pretty to be left alone, and her mother is against her. She is young, and the force of nature is strong, and women are born for sacrifice—she will marry one of those young shrimps, and will carry in her sphere where she has been called.'

At this thought a sharp pang of disappointment shot through him that he started with surprise. 'Oh, no, this is not jealousy; it is a protest against what is probable in the name of the eternal fitness of things. Nevertheless, he went on thinking very disagreeably about Mr. Fanny. 'How can a nice girl endure a fellow who pomatus his hair in that fashion, and sounds his R's in that way, and talks about Theodore Thomsen and Cinnamatta? Still, they do it, and Providence must be on the side of that sort of man. But what business is all this of mine? I have half a mind to go to Europe again.'

He stopped, lighted a cigar, and walked briskly homeward. As he passed by the building cottage he saw that the lower story was in darkness, and in the windows above the light was glowing behind the shades. 'So Fanny is gone, and the tired young traveller is going early to bed. He went into his library and sat down by the dying embers of the grate. His mind had been full of Alice and her prospects during his long walk in the moonlight; and now, as he sat there, the image of Maud Matchin suddenly obtained ascendancy over him, and he began to compare and contrast the two girls, both so beautiful and so utterly unlike; and then his thoughts shifted all at once back to his own early life.

He thought of his childhood, of his parents removed from him so early that their memory was scarcely more than a dream; he wondered what life would have been to him if they had been spared. Then his school-days came up before him; his journey to France with his grandfather; his studies at St. Cyr; his return to America during the great war, his enlistment as a private in the regular cavalry, his promotion to a lieutenant; the days afterwards his service through the terrible campaign of the Peninsula, his wounds at Gettysburg, and at last the grand review of the veterans in front of the White House when the war was over.

But this swift and brilliant career did not long delay his musings. A dull smart like that of a healing wound drew his mind to a succession of scenes on the frontier. He dwelt with that strange fascination which belongs to the memory of hardships—and which we are all too apt to mistake for regret—upon his life of toil and danger in the wild desolation of the West. There he met, one horrible winter, the sister-in-law of a brother of his before him; a tall, languid, ill-nourished girl of mature years, with tender blue eyes and a taste for Byron. She had no home and no relatives in the world except her sister, Mrs. Keefe, whom she had followed into the wilderness. She was followed into the wilderness on the scanty resources of poor Keefe, but he made her cordially welcome like the hearty soldier that he was. She was the only unmarried white woman within a hundred miles, and the mercenary ranged from zero to 20° all winter.

In the spring she and Farnham were married; he seemed to have lost the sense of there being any other women in the world, and he took her, as an inexperienced man, to dinner the last lady remaining in a drawing-room, without special orders. He had had the consolation of reflecting that he had made her perfectly proud and happy every day of her life that was left. Before the autumn ended, she died on a forced march one day, when the air was glittering with alkali, and the fierce sun seemed to wither the dismal plain like the vengeance of heaven. Though Farnham was an even then one of the richest men in the army, so rigid are the rules imposed upon our service, by the economy of an ignorant demagogue, that no transportation could be had to supply this sick lady with the ordinary conveniences of life, and she died in his arms, on the hot road, in the shade of an overloaded baggage wagon. He mourned her with the passing grief one gives to a comrade fallen on the field of honor.

Often since he left the army, he reproached himself for not having grieved for her more deeply. 'Poor Nellie,' he would sometimes say, 'how she would have enjoyed this home, if she had lived to possess it.' But he never had that feeling of widowhood known to those whose lives have been torn in two.

IV. PROTECTOR AND PROTEGEE. A few days later Mr. Farnham attended a meeting of the library board, and presented the name of Miss Matchin as a candidate for a subordinate place in the library. There were several such positions, requiring no special education or training, the duties of which could be as well filled by Miss Matchin as by any one else. She had sent several strong letters of recommendation to the board, from prominent citizens who knew and respected her father, for when Maud in childhood had her near ambition, Matchin entered heartily into the affair, and bestowed himself to use what credit he had in the ward to assist her.

Maud had not exaggerated the effect of her blood-impurities upon Doctor Bush. The old gentleman spoke in her favor with great gusto; 'she was young, healthy, active, intelligent, a graduate of the high school.' 'And very pretty, is she not?' heard a member of the board, maliciously.

The doctor called, but was not satisfied. He gazed steadily at the interrupter through his round glasses, and said: 'Yes, she is very fine looking—but I do not see that that should stand in her way.' Not another word was said against her, and a ballot was taken to decide the question. There were five members of the board, three besides Farnham and Bush. Maud had two votes, and the young woman whose name had not been mentioned received the other three. Bushin counted the ballots, and announced the vote. Farnham flushed with anger. Not only had no attention been paid to his recommendation, but he had not even been informed that there was another candidate. In a few moments he was excluded from the further understanding existing among the majority, and apologized for having been paid to his recommendation, but he could not hear the murmur of approbation.

The three colleagues sat silent. At last one of them crossed his legs and said: 'I've seen some nice say off-ends. We agreed on this last several days ago. I know nothing about her, but her father used to be one of our best workers in the seventh ward. He is in the penitentiary now, and the family is down to bedrock. The reason we didn't take part in the discussion was we wanted to avoid his feelings.' The other two crossed their legs the other way, and said they 'occasionally' gave elegant parties and enjoyed by using them before and removing all dullness, pain, and distress afterwards, leaving the head clear, nerves steady and all the feelings buoyant, elastic and merry happy than he felt. The pleasing effect of a Christian or sumptuous dinner containing days afterwards.

From a careful analysis of their formula—which was attested under oath—I find that in every wise-glassful of Hop Bitters the active medicinal properties reside from the distilled spirits, equal to a full dose for an adult, which fact, in my opinion, subjects it to an internal revenue tax as a medicinal-bitter. An Old Soldier's EXPERIENCE. 'I wish to express my appreciation of the valuable qualities of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral as a cough remedy. I was with Churchill's army, just before the battle of Vicksburg. I contracted a severe cold, which terminated in a dangerous cough. I found no relief till one morning when I was in a country store, when, on asking for some remedy, I was urged to try AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. I did so, and was rapidly cured. Since then I have kept the Pectoral constantly by me, for family use, and I have found it to be an invaluable remedy for colds and lung diseases. Thousands of testimonials testify to the prompt cure of all bronchial and lung affections, by the use of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. Being very palatable, the youngest children take it readily.
