THE BREAD WINNERS A SOCIAL STUDY. The thoughts that entered themselves to him, he chatted about all sorts of different things, were something like these: How can it have ever happened that such beauty, such dignity, such physical perfection, should be united in one person, and the best and sweetest heart have met them there? If she knew her value her pride would ruin her. In her there is everything, and everything else besides; Calista, she states, with a Christian soul. She is the best that could fall to any man, but better for me than for any one else. Anybody who sees her must love her, but I was made for nothing else but to love her. This is the mythological meant. She is Venus; she loves laughter, and her teeth and lips are divine; she has the eye and the arm of an athlete goddess. But she is a woman; she is Mrs. Belding's daughter Alice. Thank heaven, she lives here, I can call and see her. To-morrow I shall ride with her. She will love and marry some day like other women. Who is the man who shall ever kiss her between those straight brows? And fancy more audacious and extravagant fed the fever of his heart as he talked deliberate small talk, still holding his hat and whip in his hand.

He knew it was time he should go, but could not let go the joy of his eyes and ears. At last his thoughts, like a vase too full, ran over into speech. It was without premeditation, almost without conscientious intention. The undertone simply became dominant and overwhelmed the frivolous surface talk. She had been talking of her mother's plans of summer travel, and he suddenly interrupted her by saying in the most natural tone in the world, "I must see your mother before she decides. I hope you will make no plans without me. I shall go where you go. I shall never be away from you again if I can help it. No, no, do not frown about it. I must tell you. I love you. My whole life is yours." She felt terribly shocked and alarmed, so much so that his words as at her own agitation. She feared for a moment she could not rise from her seat, but she did so with an effort. He rose and approached her, evidently held in check by her inflexible face; for the crisis had brought a momentary self-control with it, and she looked formidable with her knit brows and closed lips.

"Do not go," he pleaded. "Do not think I have been wanting in respect and consideration. I could not help saying what I did. I cannot live without you any more than I can without light and air. I must have you, and you must not start with me. But I have only begun to live since I loved you, and I feel I must not waste time." She was deeply disturbed at these wild and whirling words, but still bore herself bravely. She felt her heart touched by the vibration of his ardent speech, but her maiden instincts of self defence enabled her to stand on her guard. Though bent by the storm of his emotion, she said to herself, "I could get away if he could keep from crying or sobbing, and one thought which came to her with the swiftness of lightning gave her strength to resist. It was this: "If I cry, he will take me in his arms, and we shall repeat the tableau manna saw in the rose-house." Strong in that stimulating thought, she said: "I am too sorry to hear you say these things. You know how much we always thought of you. If you forgo all this, I never again shall be your friend. But if you renew this subject, I will never speak to you again again, as long as I live."

He began to protest; but she insisted upon the calm cruelty of it, and gave him her hand; it was soft and warm as he pressed it, and if he had only known how much softer and warmer her heart was, he would have covered her hand with a thousand kisses. But he bowed and took his leave, and she, who might have been prepared for rejection; but he had been hurried into it with no thought of what the result would be, and he was equally unprepared for either issue. In face of the unwavering voice and bearing of Alice, who seemed to him more beautiful than ever as she stood before him as steady and unresponsive as a young Fate, his hot speech seemed suddenly smitten powerless. He only said: "It shall be as you wish. If I ever offend you again, I will take my punishment upon myself and get out of your way."

She did not dare to say another word, for fear it would be too kind. She gave him her hand; it was soft and warm as he pressed it, and if he had only known how much softer and warmer her heart was, he would have covered her hand with a thousand kisses. THE SANYA RITA SHERREY. Farnham walked down the path to the gate, then turned to go to his own home, with no very definite idea of what direction he was taking. The interview he had just had was still powerfully affecting his senses. He was conscious of no depression from the prompt and decided refusal he had received. He was depressed in his heart, but he had not lost a sharp word which does not immediately cripple him, the perception of which is lost in the enjoyment of a new, keen, and entrancing experience. His thoughts were full of his own affairs, and he was not aware of the fact that he was being followed by a woman, rather than of her coldness. Seeing his riding-whip in his hand, he started with a sudden recollection that he had intended to ride. He walked rapidly to the stable, where his horse was still waiting, and rode at a brisk trot out of the avenue for a few blocks, and then struck off to his study path that led to the woods by the river-side.

As he rode, his thoughts were at first more of himself than of Alice. He recalled over the discovery that he was in love as if some great and unimagined good fortune had happened to him. "I am not past it, then," he said to himself, repeating the phrase which had escaped from his heart when he saw Alice dismounting the stairs. "I hardly thought that such a thing could ever happen to me. She is the only one." His thoughts ran back to a night in Heidelberg, when he had seen the shadow of a woman walk with a German student of his acquaintance, and looked for over the valley at the lights of the town and the rippling waves of the Neckar, stirred by the soft breeze of the summer moon.

New Advertisement. A few days before he had been made happy by perceiving that she was no longer a child; now he took infinite pleasure in the thought of her youth; he filled his mind and his senses with the image of her freshness, her clear, sunny color, the outline of her face and form.
