TALK ABOUT HORSES.

Philip Talks to the Farmer : About Horses -Ald. Carson's Animal Admired. The Editor British Whig.

Sir,—Your correspondent signing him-self "A Frontenac Farmer" seems to be in a very fault-finding mood with the directors of the Midland Central Fair. He objects to the proposal to settle with the printers. Now, to pay the printer is a solemn duty. Next he objects to the proposal to have a bicycle tournament. If the directors give the young men a prize then they expect it will draw a large attendance and therefore pay. But his main grievance is that Mr. John Carson has imported a Suffolk your reporter picked up that item on the street and that it was inserted accident. like any other piece of news. But the "Frontenac Farmer" says Ald. J. farmers as to make money. Of course the owner of the "Palmer" expects a return for his investment. He would be a fool if he did not. Does not every other proprietor of a stallion do the same? But the farmer quotes the King John of Abyssinia ranks his breed of the Suffolk Punch is not suit | realm. Now, we carriages and they had style, speed and roasted leg of mutton for dinner to the staying power. The farmers of Fron- poor children of a neighbouring public tenac have always kept horses that are school too light. It is not economy to keep horses that are too small, because one has to go twice for a load that he ought to carry at once. Besides if the farmers had better and heavier horses they could labour their land better. The land in a great many instances is not ploughed at all. The surface is merely scratched. The Suffolk Punch then is just the very kind of a horse the farmers want. It It is not a species of spindle shanked nondescript mongrel horse the farmers

Biggs and his intended bride, unconscious of the chase, arrived at the river, entered a skiff and started across. Hardly had they left the bank, however, when the pursuers dashed down to the shore. Jumping into another boat, the young lady's father and brother followed the lovers, at the same time calling upon them to stop. When about half way across the river the fugitives were overhauled, and dropping their oars, the father and son aprang into the boat. The former grappled with Biggs, and the son took his sister into the other ed, and father and the lover sank and were drowned. Of course cartious, canny Scotsmen cannot enter into the rash, daring spirit of the goahead natives here, or fully analyze their motives, far less their calculations in their eager, mad rush to be rich; but it certainly appears to us that so man having a particle of common sense left in him would have acted as the General is shown to have done. Talk of the dictates of filial affection is simply "high falutin." Such love is not displayed in mad speculations, but in safe investments for their benefit. The truth seems to be that the General
