A BUSY SUNDAY FOR THE MATCHINS. Matters were not going on pleasantly in the Matchin cottage. Mand's success in gaining an eligible position, as it was regarded among her friends, made her once an object of greater interest, than ever; but her temper had not improved with her circumstances, and she showed herself no more accessible than before. Her father, who naturally felt, a certain satisfaction at having, as he thought, established her so well, regarded himself as justified in talking to her firmly and seriously respecting He went about it in the only way he knew how. "Mattie," he said . one evening, when they happened to be alone together, "When are you and Sam WHAT WE HAVE:

you take good advice-" but she was gone before he could say another word. Saul walked up and down the room a few moments, taking very short steps. and solacing his mind by muttering to himself: "Well, that's what I get by having a scholar in the family. Learning goes to the head and the heels-makes 'em proud and skittish."

He punctually communicated his failure to Sam, who received the news with a sullen quietness which perplexed still more the puzzled carpenter. . On a Sunday afternoon, a few days later, he received a visit from Mr. Bott, whom he welcomed with great deference and some awe, as an ambassador from a ghostly world of unknown dignity. They talked in a stiff and embarrassed the prospect of a rise in wages, and other such matters, neither obviously taking interest in what was being said. "Mr. Matchin," he said with an uneasy grin, " I have come to see you about your
