never want to see them again. That ugly creature who went up with Alice for the money—you caught him? I am so glad. The impudence of the creature! going upstairs with my daughter as if she was not to be trusted. Well, she added candidly, "she wasn't that time, but it was none of his business." Here Farnham and Alice both laughed out, and the sound of the other's voice was very pleasant to each of them, hough they did not look toward each "I am beginning to think that the world is growing too wicked for single women," Mrs. Belding continued philosophically. "Men can take care of themselves in so many ways. They can use a club as you do "Daily and habitually," assented Ar-

"Or they can make a speech about Ireland and the old flag, as Mr. Belding used to; or they can swear like Mr. Temple. By the way Alice, you were not liere when Mr. Temple swore so at those thieves. I was scandalized, but I had to admit it was very appropriate." "I was also away from the room, said Farnham; "but I can readily believe the comminatory clauses must have been very cogent."

"Oh, yes! and such a nice woman "Yes, Mrs. Temple is charming," said Farnham rising. " Arthur, don't go! Stay to dinner.

It will be ready in one moment. It will strengthen our nerves to have a man dine with us, especially a liberating hero like you. Why, you seemed to me last night like Perseus in the picture, coming to rescue What's-her-name from the rock."

Farnham glanced at Alice. Her eyes were fixed upon the ground; her fingers were tightly clasped. She was wishing with all her energy that he would stay, waiting to catch his first word of assent, but unable to utter a syllable. "Alice," said Mrs. Belding, rather sharply, "I think Arthur does not regard my invitation as quite sufficient. Will you give it your approval?" Alice raised her face at these words and looked up at Farnham. It was a beautiful face at all times, and now it was rosy with confusion, and the eyes were timid but kind. She said with lips that trembled a little: "I should be very glad to have Captain Farnham stay to dinner." She had waited too long, and the words were a little too formal, and Arthur excused himself on the plea of having to look out for his cohort, and went home to a lonely dinner.

OFFITT DIGS A PIT. A week had passed by; the great strike was already almost forgotten. A few poor workmen had lost their places. A few agitators had been dismissed fer excellent reasons, having no relation with the strike. The mayor had recovered from his panic, and was beginning to work for a renomination, on the strength of his masterly dealing with the labor difficulties, in which, as he handsomely said in a circular composed by himself and signed bythis friends, he "nobly accomplished the duty allotted him of preserving the rights of property while respecting the rights of the people of keeping the peace according to his oath, and keeping faith with the masses, to which he belonged, in their struggle against monopoly. The rich and prosperous people, as their manner is, congratulated themselves on their escape, and gave no thought to the questions which has come so near to an issue of fire and blood. In this city of two hundred those sand people, two or three dozen polici cians continued as before to govern to assess and to spend its taxes, to use as their property and their chattel. T. rich and intelligent kept on mak.

money, building fine houses, and brin, ing up children to hate politics as the did, and in fine to fatten themselves sheep which should be mutton whency the butcher was ready. There was hardly a millionaire on Algonquin Av nue who knew where the ward me. ings of his party were held. There w not an I. i sh laborer in the city but kin his way to the ward club as well as t

Among those who had taken part the late exciting events and had now i verted to private life was Sam Sleen His short sentence had expired; he h. and his fine and come back to Matchin But he was not the quiet, contente workman he had been. He was som sullen, and discontented. He nourishe a dull grudge against the world. He hatried to renew friendly relations with Maud, but she had repulsed him with positive scoru. Her mind was full o her new prospects, and she did not carto waste time with him. The scene in the rose-house rankled in his heart; he could not but think that her mind had been poisoned by Farnham, and his hate camed intensity every hour. In this frame of mind he fell easily into the control of Offitt. That worth had not come under the notice of the law for the part he took in the attack on the Belding house; he had not been r. cognized by Farnham's men, nor de nounced by his associates; and so, after a day or two of prudential hiding, he came to the surface again. He met San. at the very door of the House of Correc tion, sympathised with him, flattered him, gained his full confidence at last and held him ready for some purpose which was vague even in his own brain. He was determined to gain possession of Maud, and he felt it must be through some crime, the manner of which was not quite clear to him. If he could use Sam to accomplish his purpose and save his own skin, that would be best. His mind ran constantly upon theft, forgery, burgiary, and murder; but he could frame no scheme which did not involve risks that turned him sick. If he could hit upon something where he might furnish the brains, and Sam the physical force and the risk! He dwelt upon this day and night. He urged Sam to talk of his own troubles; of the Matchins at last, of Mand and his love, and it was not long before the tortured fellow had told him what he saw in the rose-house Strangely enough the thought of his fiancee leaning on the shoulder of another man did not in the least diminish the arder of Offitt. His passion was entirely free from respect or good-will. He used the story to whet the edge of Sam's hatred against Farnham. "Why, Sam, my boy," he would say, WHAT WE HAVE ! your honor is at stake." "I would as soon kill him as eat, Sam answered. "But what good would that do me? She cares no more for me than she does for you." Offitt was sitting alone in his room one afternoon; his eyes were staring

"Well, you know, Farnham is a good sort of fellow, and to keep us from losing time he lets us come to his house in the evening, after working hours, on quarterday, instead of going to his office in the day time. You see, I trot up there after supper and get rid of this wad." O litt's eyes twinkled like those of an " How many of you do this ?" "Oh, a good many-most everybody in our ward and some in the Ninc
