THE BREAD-WINNERS

A SOCIAL STUDY.

An hour afterward her mother returned, escorted by one of the surgeons. She found Alice in bed, peacefully sleeping. As Mrs. Belding approached the bedside, Alice woke and smiled. "I know without your telling me, mamma. He will live. I began to pray for him—but I felt sure he would live, and so I gave thanks

"You are a strange girl," said Mrs. Belding, gravely. "But you are right. Dr. Cutts says, if he escapes without fover, there is nothing serious in the wound itself. The blow that made that gash in his head was not the one which made him unconscious. They found another, behind his car; the skin was not broken. There was a bump about as big as a walnut. They said it was concussion of the brain, but no fracture anywhere. By the way, Dr. Cutts complimented me very handsomely on the way I had managed the case before his arrival. He said there was positively a professional excellence about my bandage. You may imagine I did not set

Alice, laughing and blushing, said, "I will allow you all the credit.' Mrs. Belding kissed her and said, "Good-night," and walked to the door. There she paused a moment, and came back to the bed. "I think, after all, I had better say now what I thought of keeping till to morrow. I thank you for your confidence of to-night, and shall respect it. But you will see, I am sure. the necessity of being very circumspect. under the circumstances. If you should want to do anything for Arthur while he is ill, I should feel it my duty to forlice received this charge with frank open eyes. "I should not dream of such a thing," she said. " If he had died, I should have been his widow; but, as he is to live, he must come for me if he wants me. I was very silly about him, but I must take the consequences. I can't now take advantage of the poor fellow, by saving his life and establishing a claim on it. So I will promise any thing you want. I am so happy that I will promise easily. But I am also very sleepy."

The beantiful eyelids were indeed heavy and drooping. The night's excitement had lett her wearied and utterly content. She tell as'eep even as her mother kissed her for head.

The feeling of Other as he left Algonquin Avenue and struck into a side street was one of pure exultation. He had a complished the boldest act of his life. He had shown address, skill, and courage. He had done a thing which had appalled him in contemplation, merely on account of its physical difficulties and dargers. He had done it successfully. He had a large amount of money in his pocket-enough to carry his bride to the endsof the earth. When it was gone-well, at worst, he could leave her, and shift for himself again. He had not a partials of regret or remorse; and, in fact, these sentiments are far rarer than to dists would have us believe. A ruftie who commits a crime usually gloss in it. It exalts him in his own eyes, all the more that he is compelled to keep silent about it. As Offitt walked rapidly in the direction of Dean street, the only shadow on his exultation was the sadden perception of the fact that he had better not tell Mand what he had done. In all his plans he lead promised himself the pleasure of her re over to the let the lover; he had those the beater with first kiss by that how and a cont man, as he walked stead the sewarthe sight street. he saw that now a or the universe could be made his confident. "I'll never own it, in earth or hell," he said to himself. When he reached Matchin's cottage all was dark and still. He tried to attract Mand's attention by throwing soft clods of earth against her window, but her sleep was too sound. He was afraid to throw pebbles for fear of breaking the panes and waking the family. He went into the little yard adjoining the shop and found a ladder. He brought it out and placed it against the wall. He perceived now for the first time that his hands were sticky. He gazed at them a moment. "Oh, yes," he said to himself, " when he fell I hold out my hands to keep his head from touching my clothes. Carcless trick! Ought to have washed them first thing." Then, struck by a su blen blea, he went to the wellarb, and slightly moistened his fingers. He then rubbed them on the door knob, act the edge of the door of the cottage, and pressed them several times in different places on the ladder. "Not a bad scheme," he said, chuckling. He tiren went again to the well and washed he hands thoroughly, afterward taking a handful of earth and rubbing them till they were as dirty as usual.

After making all these preparations for future contingencies, he mounted the ladder and tried to raise the window. It was already open a few inches to admit the air, but was fastened there, and he could not stir it. He 'egan to call and whistle in as low and penetrating a tone as he could manage, and at last awoke Mand, whose bed was only a few feet away. She started up with a low cry of alarm, but saw in a moment who it

"Well, what on earth are you doing here? Go away this minute, or I'll call my father. "Let me in and I will tell you."

" I'll do nothing of the sort. Begone this instant."

"Mand, don't be foolish," he pleaded. in real alarm, as he saw that she was angry and insulted. "I have done as you told me. I have wealth for us both, and I have "-he had almost betrayed himself, but he concluded-"I have come to take you away forever."

" Come to-morrow, at a decent hour, and I will talk to you." "Now, Maud, my beauty, don't believe I am humbugging. I brought a lot of money for you to look at-I knew you wanted to be sure. See here!" He drew from his pocket a package of bank bills-he saw a glittering stain on them. He put them in the other pocket of his coat and took out another package. "And here's another, I've. got a dozen like them. Handle 'em yourself." He put them in through the window, Mand was so near that she could take the bills by putting out her haml. She saw there

She was strongly tempted. She had no longer any doubt of his wealth. He was not precisely a hero in appearance, but she had never insisted upon thather romance having been always of a practical kind. She was about to as sent—and seal her doom—when she suddenly remembered that all her best clothen were in her mother's closet. which was larger than here, and that she could not get them without passing through the room where her parents were asleep. That ended the discussion.

2 was out of the question that site should marry this magnificent stranger in her every day dress and ootton stockings. If was equally impossible that she should give that reason to any man. So she satis, with dignity:

"Mr. at, it is not proper for me to errtine to conversation any longer.
