THE BREAD-WINNERS

SOCIAL STUDY.

of the city waked Offitt from his sleep. As he dressed himself the weight of the packages in his pockets gave him a pleasant sensation to begin the day upon a new state of existence-a life with plenty of money. He composed in his mind an elaborate breakfast as he walked down stairs and took his way to a restaurant, which he entered with gave his order to the waiter with more decision than usual, and told him in

While waiting for his breakfast he opened the morning " Dale Fire" to see f there was any account of " The Algonquin Avenue Tragedy." This was the phrase which he had arranged in his mind as the probable head-line of the article. He had so convinced himself of the efficacy of his own precautions, that he anticipated the same pleasure i reading the comments upon his exploits that an author whose incognito is assured enjoys in reading the critcisms of his anonymous work. He was at first disappointed in seeing no allusion to the affair in the usual local columns; but at last discovered in a corner of the paper this double-leaded postscript :

"We stop the press to state that an appalling crime was last night committed in Algonquin evenue. The mansion of Arthur Farnham sq., was entered by burglars last night between ten and eleven o'clock, and that gentleman assaulted and probably murdered. "Full particulars in a later edition."

LATER. Captain Farnham is still living and some hopes are entertained of his recovery. The have found the weapon with which the almost fatal blow was struck—a carpenter's hammer marked with a letter S. It is thought this clew will lead to the detection of the guilty Offitt was not entirely pleased with the tone of this notice. He had expected some reference to the address and daring of the burglar. But he smiled to himself, "Why should I care for Sam's reputation?" and ate his preakfast with a good appetite. Before he had finished, however, he greatly modified his plan, which was to have the threads of evidence lead naturally. of themselves, to the conviction of Sleeny. He determined to frighten Sam, if possible, out of the city, knowing that his flight would be couclusive evidence of his guilt. He swallowed his coffee hurriedly and walked down to Dean Street. where by good fortune he found Sam alone in the shop. He was kicking about a pile of shavings on the floor. He turned as Offitt Catered, and said; "Oh, there you are. I can't find that hammer anywhere.

Offitt's face assumed a grieved expression. "Come, come, Sam, dou't stand me off that way. I'm your friend, if you've got one in the world. You mustn't lose a minute more. You've got time now to catch the 8.40. jump in a hack and be off." His carnestness and rapidity confused Sleeny, and drove all thoughts of the hammer from his mind. He stared at are you givin' me now?" "I'm a-givin' you truth and friendship, and fewest words is best. Come, light out, and write where you stop. I'll see you through.

He felt for his handkerchief to wipe his wet forehead. His hand touched one of the packages went heavily. At last an officer came in and said he was to come to the police justice's for the preliminary exami nation of Sleeny. "They have caught him, then?" he asked, with assumed eagerness and surprise. "He had not gone away?"

" No," the man answered, curtly. They came to the court room in a few steps. Sam was there between two policemen. As Offitt entered, he smiled and slightly nodded. One or two men who had been summoned as witnesses were standing near the justice. proceedings were summary. One of the policemen said he had gone

" Is that the hammer you refer to?" "Yes, that is it." These words were the signal for a terrible scene.

When Sleeny saw Offitt step forward and begin to give his evidence, he leaned turward with a smile of pleased expectation apon his face. He had such confidence in his friend's voluble cleverness that he had no doubt Offitt would "talk him free" in a few minutes. He was confused a little by his opening words. not clearly seeing his drift; but as the falsehood became clear to his mind, he was dumb with stupefaction, and fell strange curiosity waking in his mind to not, for the moment, see what object Offitt could have in lying so, until thought occurred to him: "May be there's a reward out!" But when the blood-stained hammer was shown identified by Offitt, all doubt was cleared away in a flash from the dull brain of Sleeny. He saw the whole hornible plot of which he was the victim. He rose from his seat before the officer could stop him, and roared like a lion in the toils, in a voice filled equally with agony and rage : "You murdering liar! I'll tear the heart out of you!" There was a wide table and several chairs between them, but Sleeny was the fat producing properties of Flax-seed t fore the officers could interpose. If they | macy, W. J.
