The prisoners. Tompsett and Louder, | * on the last day of their life, remained in a quiet mood, contemplating their fate with no preceptible emotions except when visited by their friends who obtained permission to have a last loving farewell with the doomed men. During these visits the prisoners wept bitterly for some time. Tompsett's wife arrived early in the morning and at noon requested to see her husband for a last time. Her farewell visit was a most pitiful scene. She entered and tottered up to the iron barred door leading to the corridor, attering an agonizing, soul-piercing cry, "Oh, God! my poor husband!" she smothered her emotions so that the parting might give her husband tittle | . .
