A SOCIAL STUDY.

Mand rose and walked up to where Sam was standing and said, "I know every word he has said is true. That man was the burglar at Captain Farn-ham's. He told me so himself to night. He said he had the money in his pocket and wanted to make me go with him. She spoke firmly and resolutely, but she could not bring herself to say anything of previous passages between them; and when she opened her lips to speak of the ladder, the woman was too strong within her, and she closed them go to hang Sam, and then I won't tell and only but the Governor," she swore

".: s casy to see about that story," said the officer, still incredulous. The saiched the clothing of Offitt, title for of the officer, as one packmey after another was brought the t was a singular study. The .. he felt in the recovery of the stolen goods was hardly equal to his professional chagrin at having caught to wrong man. He stood for a moent silent, after tying up all the pack

" It's no use dodging," he said at last We have been barking up the wrong

"I don't know about that," said the one called Tony Smart. "Who has identified this money? Who can answer for this young lady? How about them marks on the door and the ladder? Anyhow there's enough to hold our pri "Of course there is," said the captain.

"He hadn't authority to go twisting people's necks in this county." At this moment the wagon which had been sent for arrived. The body of Offitt was lifted in. The captain gathered up the money, notified Matchin that he and his family would be wanted as witnesses in the morning, and they all moved toward the door. Sam turned to say " Farewell." Pinioned as he was. he could not shake hands, and his veice faltered as he took leave of them. Maud's heart was not the most feeling one in the world, but her emotions had been deeply stirred by the swift succession of events; and as she saw this fellow going bravely to meet an unknown fate, purely for her sake, the tears came to her eyes. She put out her hand to him; but she saw that itihands' were fastened, and, seized with pity, she put her arms about his unch and kissed him, whispering, " heep up a good heart. Sam!" and he went away. in all his danger and ignominy baja a r than he had been for many a d y.

The probabilities of the case were much discussed that night at police bend part is, in conferences from which the reporters were regorously excluded. and the next morning the cut news papers revelled in the ensation. They yied with each other in inventing attractive head lines and startling theories. The Bul -Fire began its leader with the impressive sentence: " Has a carnival of crime set in amongst us? Last night the drama of Algonquin avenue was supplemented by the tragedy of Dean street, and the public, aghast, demands 'What next?' A second murder was accomplished by hands yet dripping with a previous crime. The patriotic witness, who, yesterday, with a bleeding heart, denounced the crimina ty of his friend, paid last night with h life for his fidelity." In another co.umn it called for a "monument, by

son Offitt, who died because he would not tell a lie. On the other hand the Morning Astral, representing the Conservative opinion of the city, called for a suspension of judgment on the part of its candid readers; said that there were shady circumstances about the antecedents of Offitt, and intimated that documents of a compromising character had been found on his person; congratulated the city on the improved condition of Captain Farnham; and, trusting in the sagacity and intelligence of the authorities, confidently awaited from them a solution of the mystery. Each of them, nevertheless gave free space and license to their reporters, and Offitt was a saint, a miscreant, a disguised prince, and an escaped convict, according to the state of the reporter's imagination or his digestion; while the stories told of Sleeny varied from cannibalism to feats of herculean goodness. They all agreed reasonably well, however, as to the personal appearance of the two men, and from this fact it came about that, in the course of the morning, evidence was brought forward from a totally unexpected quarter, which settled the question as to the burglary at Farnham's.

Mrs. Belding had been so busy the day before, in her constant attendance upon Farnham, that she had paid no attention to the story of the arrest. She had heard that the man had been eaught, and his crime fully established, and that he had been sent to jail for trial. Her first thought was, " I am glad I was not called upon to give evidence. It would have been very disagreeable to get up before a court-room full of men and say I looked with an opera-glass out of my daughter's window into a young man's house. I should have to mention Alice's name, too-and a young giri's name cannot be mentioned too seldom in the newspapers. In fact, twice in a life-time is often enough, and one of them should be a

But this morning, after calling at Farnham's and finding that he was getting on comfortably, she sat down to read the newspapers. Alice was sitting near her with her hands and lap full of some feminine handiwork. A happy smile played about her lips, for her mother had just repeated to her the surgeon's prediction that Captain Farnham would be well in a week or two. "He said the scalp wound was healing 'by the first intention,' which I thought was a funny phrase. I thought the maxim was that second thoughts were

Alice had never mentioned Farnham's name since the first night, but he was rarely out of her mind, and the thought that his life was saved made every hour bright and festal. "He will be well," she thought. "He will have to come here to thank mamma for her care of him. I shall see him again, and he shall not complain of me. If he should never speak to me again, I shall love him and be good to him always." She was yet too young and too innecent to know now impossible was the scheme of life thoroughly happy in it. Mrs. Belding, as she read, grew per-plexed and troubled. She threw down one newspaper and took up another, but evidently got no more comfort out of that. At last she sighed and said, " Oh, dear! Oh, dear! I shall have to go down there after all. They have got the wrong man!"

Alice looked up with wondering

"These accounts all agree that the assassin is a tall, powerful young man with yellow hair and heard. The real man was not more than medium height very dark. Why, he was black and shiny as a cricket. I must go and tell them. I wonder who the lawyer is who does the inditing of people?" "It must be the prosecuting attorney, Mr. Dulton," said Alice. "I heard be
