A SOCIAL STUDY.

The result of it all was, of course, that Sleeny was acquitted, though it came about in a way which may be worth recording. The jury found a verdict of justifiable homicide," upon which the judge very properly sent them back to their room, as the verdict was flatly against the law and the evidence. They retired again, with stolid and unabashed patience, and soon reappeared: with a verdict of acquittal, on the ground of emotions insanity." But this remark. able jury determined to do nothing by halves, and fearing that the reputation of being queer might injure Sam in his business prospects, added to their ver-dict these thoughtful and considerate words, which yet remain on the record, to the lasting honor and glory of our system of trial by jury :

" And we hereby state that the prisoner was perfectly sane up to the mo-ment he committed the rash act in question, and perfectly sane the moment after, and that, in our opinion, there is no probability that the malady will ever

Farnham's convalescence was rapid. When the first danger of fever was over the wound on the head healed quickly. and one morning Mrs. Belding came home with the news that he was to drive out that afternoon. Alice sat in the shade by the front porch for an hour. waiting to see him pass, and when at last his carriage appeared, she rose and waved her handkerchief by way of greet ing and congratulation. He bowed as he went by and Alice retired to her own 100m, where she used her handkerehief once more to dry her wet and happy

It was not long after, that Farnham came to dine with them. They both looked forward to this dinner as an occasion of very considerable importance Each felt that much depended upon the demeaner of the other. Each was conscientiously resolved to do and say noth ing which should pain or embarrass the other. Each was dying to fall into the other's arms, but each only succeeded in convincing the other of his or her en tire indifference and friendship.

As Farnham came in, Mrs. Belding went up to him with simple kindliness. kissed him, and made him sit down. "You dear boy," she said, "you do not know how glad I am to see you here once

Alice looked on almost jealous of her mother's privilege. Then she advanced with shy grace and took Arthur's hand. and asked: "Do you begin to feel quite strong again ?"

Farnham smiled and answered." Quite well, and the strength will soon come. My first symptom of returning vitality. Mrs. Belding, was my hostality to gree! and other phantom dishes. I have deliberately come to dinner to-day to

But she was so kindly about it, and Arec aided and abetted with such bash nd prettiness, that Farnham felt be con'd endure starvation with such accessomes. Yet he was not wholly at case He had hoped, in the long hours of his outinement, to find the lady of his love ander in voice and manner than wher to saw her last; and now, when she was sweeter and more tender than he had ver seen her before, the self-tormenting mind of the lover began to suggest that if she loved him she would not be so kind. He listened to the soft, caressing tones of her voice as she spoke to him. which seemed to convey a blessing in every syllable; he met the wide clear beauty of her glance, so sweet and bright that his own eyes could hardly support it; he saw the ready smile that came to the full, delicate mouth whenever he spok.d instead of being made happy by all this, he alked himself if it could mean anything except that she was sorry for him, and wanted to be very polite to him, as she could be nothing more. His heart sank within him at the thought; be became silent and constrained; and Alice wondered whether she had not gone too far in her resolute kindness Perhaps he has changed his mind. she thought, "and wishes me not to change mine." So these two people, whose hands and hearts were aching to come together, sat in the same drawingroom talking of commonplace things, while their spirits grew heavy as lead.

Mrs. Belding was herself conscious of certain restraint, and to dispel it asked Alice to sing, and Farnham adding his ntreaties, she went to the piano, and
