EYRE'S ACQUITTAL.

BY HELEN B. MATHERS.

But as a side-thought will sweep a man out of the track of sober fact, and bid tragedy itself pause while he dallies with a folly, so Mr. Eyre's mind started off at a tangent to Madcap, and rested there, just as a mariner in drowning looks up to the patch of blue above him: So the darkened chamber, the white chair, receded from Mr. Eyre's eyes, and in their place he saw an old-fashioned garden, and a young girl stepping backward down a ladder, as, aloud, she counted the plums on the garden-wall. Anon he saw the same young shape (but three months older) sitting beneath the white plume of a thorn, whose blos-soms were no paler than her cheeks, till a step on the turf made, her turn, and the next moment two gentle arms, arms that trembled, but did not doubt, were round his neck. . . A trysting-place (six hours later), to which a young shape in a white gown came stealingall her worldly goods tied up in her pocket handkerchief, and nothing in life to keep her warm but her lover's arms. . . A hurried marriage, at which an old friend of the bride's assisted, and then six years of such happiness as might make a wicked man in love with rights and look back with loothing on virtue, and look back with loathing on the pleasures he had found in sin. And those arms held her fast and safe through these six short, happy years—ay, and made to her so sure a heaven that dreamlessly she had sunk to her last rest in them, knowing neither fear nor pain, so long as they were closed about her—yea, and even in the moment of death knew no pang, but called it the happiest moment of her

She had been happy to the last-exultantly in that lonely chamber. Mr. Eyre lifted his brows to Heaven, and cried aloud, that no matter what his suffering, sin, and shame might be, she had never suffered. Suddenly he rose, and stretching out his hands toward you empty bed, called wildly and passionately, "Madcap!" The starved cry rang through the si-lent house as, pierced though all his armory of pride by that living thought of her, the strong man awakened for the first time to the full desolation of Hark! what was that? A movement rather than a sound that stole through the empty place . . . then a faint still as of something that approached waveringly and with many halts, till gradually the faint, pattering sound as of a child's bare feet upon polished boards drew nearer and nearer, till, on the threshold of Madcap's chamber, they paused as though in fear or doubt. Through the fierce wrestle of his bodily weakness with the power that crushed him, these footsteps sounded but faintly, nor when a gentle hand pushed the door open, and a little shape stood on the threshold, did he move or turn, till, feeling something approach him, he tore his hand from his eyes, and angrily WILSON'S BUILDINGS Who was it that dared intrude on him thus? He looked, but at first saw nothing; then downward, and saw close beside him a child no higher than his

"Go!" he said, once more lifting his hand in the fierce gesture of dismissal that Madcap's children had so invari-ably obeyed. But the harsh look that sped like a blow, fell faltering, for what was this? Did he not know this face by heart-

its lips-the very sunshine of its glance, ay, the very dimples in lips and cheeks -the same bright hair that had so often curled about his head . . . this could not be Josephine's child? Unconsciously he sank to his knees, she looking at him earnestly, then, with one of those angelic instincts of pity that will move a little child's heart to the comprehension of a tragedy it cannot know, and with no fear of that terrible face above her, she lifted a dimpled hand to his neck, and left it there "Is 'oo miserbul?" she said in her her other arm round his neck, and gave him that first, best, purest gift earth can afford—a child's unbidden kiss. He received it as if he were stone. . . How long ago was it since anyone had kissed him? Then, putting her from him so harshly that any but a child would have been startled into the belief that he was

"What is your name?" "I'se Madcap," she said, and laughed aloud in the desolate chamber . . . and then Mr. Eyre knew how betwixt him and God had passed the shield of a lit-

Here was Madcap's message to him from the grave-sent to him in his darkest, loneliest hour, here in his grasp was that divinest link between God and man-the hand of a little child.

Here, in the very moment that life had practically come to a full stop, was a heart put into it. . . Ay! but through which to suffer, to be made to rememinstrument by which his stubborn soul was to be brought to submission?

No such thought touched him as he bowed his head on the little innocent breast that took him with all its sins upon it, and, neither questioning, nor doubting, knew only that he was in trouble, and that he was her friend. "Can't find Jocy anywhere," she said, shaking the bright head that rested on Mr. Eyre's raven locks, "and I don't like being left all by my lone self-has oo' come to stop," she added, suddenly.

"What's oo' name?" "I am your father." "O! no," said the child, looking at him with grave, lovely eyes-"Daddy's Inflammation of the Urinary Organs, dead-Jocy said so this afternooncaused by Indigestion and Exposure. Hotel Dies Hos-pital, Paris, Treatment. CHAPTER VI. By eight o'clock came riding in hel speed Colonel Busby, a magistrate of the neighborhood, and the most pesti-lential busybody within it. But when he came to the vast hall, whose lofty ceiling was still in gloom, while the light from the stained-glass windows fell but faintly on Lord Lovel's uncovered face, upon which, as yet, no change had come, with such incredible rapidity had Mr. Eyre brought him home, involuntarily he bared his head, and, coming to the side of the coffin, looked down with a real impulse of sorrow on the young fellow's face.

How well he remembered Frank Lovel in life, and how nobly he had taken on himself Mr. Eyre's sins; and now the one lay dead, while the other lived and flourished, ripening, perhaps, for some new crime, and defying alike the justice of God and the opinion of

The busybody had come in war, secretly suspecting some mystery about Frank's death, but outwardly to demand by what right Mr. Eyre commanded the young man's grave to be dug, and the burial to take place, before the process of identification had been gone through, or the heir and his advisers summoned. But at first one, then another came in, those who had loved him, those who had blamed him; yea, and those who had pitied while they honored him. All these, I say, as they went, knew him; and as the hours were wept, knew him; and as the hours were on, and more and more people gathered, Frank lay in state, however humble, and was a hero, so that strong men wept for the thought of the manner of his death, and the women for the glimpse of the stain on his nearlet coat, above which his hamis rested so quietly, their Agent for the Louisard Investment Company Start of security for investors ; payments secur-ed ; full information as to; investments gives. Vast and sinewy as a gladiator of Kome, with a dark, stern face upon which the fires of over forty years had legibly left their mark, Mr. Eyre stood like a second Saul among those around, too negligent of their presence to defy between the ankle and knee of his right leg. He has taken two bottles of Shaker Blood Syrup, the sores have disappeared

Those around thought his face hardened as he looked down on his dead friend but his lips moved neither in blessing nor cursing, and none could have told whether the stern restraint of pain or the callousness of hatred held him motionless during the minutes that he stood beside him.

When at last he moved, it was with the old firm step and air of command, so that, involuntarily, the women around courtesied and the men pulled each his forelock, ashamed of their doubts of him, for Job's love had cleared the way for Mr. Eyre, and none durst suspect him of harm to Lord Lovel

but I won't quarrel with you-there is no railing in an allowed fool-and for the first time in my life, I find your conversation interesting. And pray whom did you think guilty?" "Well," said Bushy, hesitating for a moment, but hardened by that allusion to his folly, "it was generally considered that you ought to have changed places with the woman, and been tried for it yourself-but being a fool, I only repeat what was of common report." "And what is your own opinion." said Mr. Eyre, grimly. "What my opinion was matters little now that there is not a shadow of doubt your gardener is guilty," said Colonel Busby, stiffly.

"Don't alter your opinion on that score," said Mr. Eyre, carelessly. "I'm not at all sure that either of them did it-or if so, the woman Clarke was zecessory to the crime, and deserved hanging. Mr. Eyre, grimly, "and now you'd bet-ter run back to Mrs. Busby, and retail your news-if any; you've filled my budget with food for a week." And Mr. Eyre went on his way down one of the three avenues that were the glory of The Towers and the pride of the Lovels—avenues that branched like
