As he watched its wild fierce spirit entered into his blood, and with it his own rose—he was once more himself, and the past night of his self-abasement vanished like a dream; he had been out of sorts, fasting, and had conjured up thoughts that the brisk morning air dispersed. His interview with Colonel Busby had refreshed him; his weapons might have rusted, but had not worn out; and even as a suspected murderer

he could hold his own yet.

And at the end of this avenue, that ran straight as the crow flies to the foot of the Red Hall, he would find somebody—something; and then the dance, the whistle, the rush of the leaves and wind blended, held him no longer, and he went forward, bent only on his

Once he had gone this way with Frank and Madcap, and he had moved beside them like aghost. Now he walked the same path, living, and knowing that, beyond any taking away of Frank or any other, she was his, had been always his to the last beat of her heart; and even in dying had left him (so loath was she to leave him quite) a lovely message in her own image, that should reach and stay him in the first hour of physi-cal and mental weakness that he had

He gave no backward thought to the dead now lying in the Towers. He had not forgiven him, and never would, even though Madcap had loved the boy; and to Mr. Eyre's own heart there had been no living soul (save her) so near to it as Frank Lovel.

CHAPTER VII. No regular notifications of the hour of Lord Lovel's funeral were sent out, or invitations in the county given; nevertheless, nearly every man of any consequence in it came, so that from the gates of the Towers to the churchvard there was an unbroken procession of men and women all on foot, as were the pall-bearers, so that not a sign of ostentation of hired grief marred the

Mrs. Eyre's burying; but there were no flowers on this coffin, nor did Mr. Eyre 128 and 130 Princess Street, follow, but a bright-faced boy brought fresh from school, and looking round repeatedly for the only face he knew among the bewildering crowd at his heels. But with his habitual contempt for laws and appearances, Mr. Eyre came last of all, leading a little child, whose dressing had possibly delayed him, as she had a boa tied on over her white pinafore, and a bonnet on that certainly was never made for her, while a pair of her father's gauntleted gloves extended to her shoulders, and kept dry and warm her dimpled hands and arms. Though they came last, the crowd divided, and the right of precedence at the grave was given them; indeed, a clear circle was left around the pair, WILSON'S BUILDINGS. that might have touched a less sensitive man than Mr. Eyre; but the only sign of feeling he gave during the burial service was when he looked down at the child's feet, and for the first time observing that she wore shoes, snatched her up, and, having stripped them off, chafed her feet, then wrapped them and her warmly in his cloak, and stood impassible as before.

Madcap the younger had been quite happy as she trotted along beside him, and the sight of so many people, and some familiar faces, pleased her, but she was happiest of all when "Dad" took her up, and from the eminence of his stature gave her a bird's-eye view of the proceedings that ended in a long stare at a boy, whose head did not reach her father's elbow as he stood behind it.
When that droll little head popped over Mr. Eyre's shoulder, the boy looked up, and fell in love at once with her, so that when her blue eyes dropped to him, and her rosy lips pouted to him in token of satisfaction, it was natural enough that he should reach up to, and little scene, and considered it unseemly to the last degree. The villagers whispered that here was the old story over again, a Lovel would love a Madcap, even to his own undoing, to the end of time. Most of those present thought of how Frank had led Doune at the older Madcap's funeral; and some of them saw, grudgingly, how Providence, in meting out its bitters, had kept some sweets for Mr. Eyre yet. His innocence, too, was clear, and men wondered that they could have doubted him; even Colonel Busby, with a sigh, relinquished his suspicions, and hated him worse than before. Those who saw him that day-this terrible man, this monster of evil incarnate, who had stalked tearless, unheeding, through tragedies at which an angel might have wept—with a little child clinging to his hand, prattling, looking up into his face with perfect trust and love, somehow they felt their conviction of his Satanship rudely shaken, and sion of feeling toward him. Perhaps some of the men thought of how great had been his wife's love for him, and she had not been one to love unworthily; perhaps every woman present saw that he had dressed the child to coftand the money if the treatment does not effect a care. It is the CHRAPERT AND BERT Medicine in the Market. Famphlet sent free by mail to any address.

The Duke of Marmiton, who had been grave, on entering the room, took Mr. Eyre's hand very warmly (not seeming to notice that it was his left, the right being occupied with Madcap's shoe), and bade him a hearty welcome home

It was dated three and a half years ago, and immediately after Lord Lovel had returned from his long absence with his regiment abroad.

For gradually (there being no one to keep order) the room had filled, and many a friend and tenant of Frank, and Frank's father, heard Mr. Eyre's words; so that when he had picked up his little daughter, and bade the young heir "Good-by till Christmas," nodding, in farewell, to the lawyer, and the rest, he passed out among men who had already half forgiven him for his strange behavior by the grave.
