the nursery wing facing him. There was only one in the day nursery, but Mr. Eyre remembered Doune's care of his little sister's feet, and had no fear that the two were abroad, only as he dropped the blind it struck him that his wife from opposite might even thus have watched his light, as hour after hour he sat among his books leaving her lonely, save for her children. On the very night that she died, he had so left her on some paltry errand of scribbling, though on this occasion she had Lord Lovel to bear,her company, and to Mr. Eyre the hours had passed unheeded, till the cry of murder roused him, and he had ascended the private staircase to find her unconscious, and stabbed to the heart. But to-night the neglect lay not with him, but with Madcap's daughter, who had not a thought to give to the man who presently ate his solitary dinner and dessert without a ripple of the ten-der voice that had been wont to adorn it. His dinner hour had been put back to six in recognition of her bed-time, which was seven; but eight had struck, and Mr. Eyre was in his study, when a knock at the door sounded, and Madcap's nurse set her down inside it, half asleep and bundled up in shawls. She climbed on his knee with difficulty, and "Come to say my poors!" she said; and the next moment had fallen sound asleep on his shoulder. Mr. Eyre signed to the woman to go, and with exultation thought that at least the child had remembered him twice in all the rapture of Doune's return; and when in half an hour's time had so far softened toward the boy that had they met then a better feeling might have been established between
