When Mr. Evre next went to Synge-lane he found Hester Clarke's reply to his message, in the form of a sealed letter to himself.

It had neither beginning nor ending, and contained very few words; but these were significant. Janet Stork was dead, and she herself returning to England immediately She had heard Mr. Eyre was resolved to seek her out, and most solemnly warned him to desist from any such attempt, since she could not tell him more than he did already know of, and, for the sake of both the dead and the living no one on earth should force her to open her lips on the subject.

"Justice may yet," said Mr. Eyre, aloud, as he folded the letter. "Tell her this from me when you write, that she shall speak, and I'll have the whole truth from her lips yet before I die; and he went out, with a curious feeling that the battle was beginning over again, and that the peace of the last few weeks had been but a rest before the coming struggle. So the clew that had dropped from Frank's dead hand was held safe in Hester's living one, and he would find and wrest it from her, though it took him a dozen years

She could not tell kim nothing that he did not know already. Ay, that was true enough, for he knew her guilty of the murder, and to-day was more rooted in his belief of it than ever. His spirits rose as he walked home, and pausing at the churchyard, he thought that in time he might even come to forgive Frank, whose mind had no doubt been poisoned against him by the woman's lies. Within an hour Mr. Eyre had telegraphed to the Governor of the convict settlement in which Janet had died for any information obtainable about the woman who had visited her.

Before night the answer came back, that nothing was known of Hester Clarke's plans beyond the fact that her destination was England, for which

Here was material upon which to work but inquiry only elicited the fact that Hester Clarke had left the ship at a port half-way home, though the captain did not think that her circumstances warranted the loss of half her passage money.

He had therefore returned it to her; and was much amazed when, by return of post, he received a check from Mr. Eyre. and a request for an immediate interview. This duly took place at Poplar, the honest bluff fellow refusing the Remember the Place - Princess Street, 2nd | money, but willing to give Mr. Eyre all the information he kn. w. He said that he had heard she was going home because the friend for whom she had come out to the settlement was dead, and she had been heard to say she wished she had died with her, as she had no friends to return to in her own country. "And her appearance?" said Mr.

"The handsomest creature I ever saw in my life," said the sailor, with a weather-beaten blush that did not escape the other, "but with that look on her face-"A look of guilt?" said Mr. Eyre.

"Lord bless you, no," said the honest sailor, indignantly; "she wouldn't hurt DAY a fly-but she looked like one who's seen sorrow, and maybe worse things, in her time. I asked her to marry me, Sir, and now the murder's out-but she wouldn't, and there's an end on't," he added, wondering what this stern, dark man might have had to do with her past life, or what with her future? "You may thank God that she would not," said Mr. Eyre, dryly, You will be going back before loss?"

"This day month for me," said Mr. Eyre, "for I'v go with you." "The acommodation's rough, Sir." said the man, feeling a curious unwill-

"I wish I may be doing her no ill turn," thought the honest fellow (honest and thorough as surely sailors are above all other men), "but I doubt if he finds her there-she's not the sort of woman to be caught if she's minded to give any man the slip." But as it turned out Mr. Eyre was not one of the halfdozen passengers who sailed in the good ship Arizona. The very hour of his departure deferred to the last moment, that he might wish little Madcap good-by in her sleep, and so spare herself and him a scene of pain; nay, at the very moment when, cloaked and gloved, he entered the nursery, he was startled to hear her singabruptly changing to a horrible barking sound that tore his heart-strings where he stood then saw the child struggling to rise, and terrified, gasping, fighting for breath, seemed in the act of dying before his eyes.

He tore at the bell, cursing the nurse for her neglect, but, swifter than any bell could travel, the woman, when those shrill clear notes of singing burst upon her ear, had fled downward to order blankets and boiling water, and was back in the room before the look of agony had died from Mr. Eyre's face as he sat with the convulsed child in his

"Dad, what is it?" she said, looking up at him once, as helpless he hung above her, his agony greater than hers; and all his life long he never forgot that little piteous voice, the sight of her little terrified face in the midst of the steam and blankets, damp curls clinging to her brow . . . surely that other Madcap must see it, and blame him for his neglect of the child during the past weeks. He remembered that she had never been strong, though she seemed so. The little prematurely-born babe, that no one had expected to live, and she had been running wild with the ooys, and fretting over their departure; and if Mr. Eyre himself had left half un hour earlier, she would have been crying out in her misery for "Dad," and here would have been none to answer. joiced that she carried one passenger tne less than had been booked. Mr. Eyre himself put ship and man out of his mind, and on the day when he might have reached Hester's landing-place was wholly engaged in enjoy-ing the frolics of a child who, in the sparkle of a young March day, had recovered some of the brightness that she all other medicines. lost in an illness that, though five weeks old; she had not hitherto been able to

In one bitter short experience Madcap had learned the meaning of the word death, and shrank away from itshrank even from visiting her mother's grave, and knew safety nowhere out of her father's sight.

She had been taken back to her old room opposite his, and not even Doune could have found the heart to oust her from it when, at Easter, he came back to find her languid; half her beauty of rounded outlines gone, threatened daily and hourly with the deadly complaint that had already seized her twice since the one that had appalled Mr.

Perhaps the hearts of father and son merged their bitterness there at her side, and in her common love joined forces to protect her; perhaps jealousy showed as a mean and common thing as they watched over the little frail life that was the all of each; and the first fiber of respect in Donne stirred to his father when, after a long watch, Mr. Eyre laid his hand on the boy's shoulder and bade him go to rest. But first Doune went to his mother and, light in hand, looked in her eyes for reasons why she should so have loved Mr. Eyre. Perhaps the boy found them there, so that he could subordinate himself to her happiness, and when, a few days

No need to tell the boys now to take care of her. Carried over every puddle, and up every hillside, little Madcap daily gained fresh strength and tone, so that the village folks smiled to see the "master" and the boys go by with her. When ly as in their secret souls they themselves had done. Some of the women said that in making an idol of the child he had made a phantom of the mother, and that he was more "foolish" over the second Madcap than he had been over the first; and this was true in a sense, for, while he had felt himself master of helpless, and his love was all the purer that it was so much less masterful. If outwardly be wore as proud a front and carried things with as high a hand as ever, inwardly he knew himself a changed man, who looked out on life with new eyes, and in whom the very lust for vengeance was for a time extinguished, so that he hardly thought of the Arizona or of how each day his chances of tracing Hester lessened. About this time Mr. Eyre received a letter that puzzled him, since he could is not indicated by the so-called respect-

But home he had never come, and she feared some brain injury that kept him apart from her, or that he had fallen into bad hands, for he was said to have a large sum of ready money in his possession when he sailed. The mother went on to say that, having seen in a newspaper an allusion to Mr. Eyre's return with the body of the late Lord Lovel, who had joined the regiment about the same time as her son (she was able to fix the date by a letter from her boy), she ventured to write and ask if Mr. Eyre had seen or knew anything of him, the Colonel and more than half the officers being dead. and the remainder now in India. Several people remembered her landing, as she was unveiled, and her beauty was so uncommon, and she was seen to enter a foodshop close to the harbor; but from the moment she left it not the slightest trace of her could be found.
