The first night in men through in good style. camp was attended by a big wind and a great downpour of rain. The last night was a duplicate of the first one; otherwise the weather was most propitious. A few days were sultry, but on the whole more agreeable temperature could not have been experienced. With the desire to make a good record the men went through the last evolutions yesterday afternoon in splendid form. There was a large assemblage of spectators on the ground when Lieut. Col. Boulton mounted his dark brown charger with the agility of one halt his years (73) and made for the saluting base, followed by the Brigade Adjutant, Capt. Weller. The commanding officer wore a scarlet coat, with plenty of gold lace, a gold embroidered sash and belt, a brass helmet surmounted by a black and red plume. His hands were encased in white gauntlets, and his boots were set off by a handsome pair of spurs. As soon as he had taken u position he was received with a general salute.
