Mirage.

Hot lies the sand beneath the weary feet;
The skies are dazzling downward through the heat;
No breath of wind to stir the heavy air,
No fleck of cloud to break the cruel glare
Of the fierce sunshine, as the reeling brain,
Strives to force on the failing strength, in vain.

Nay, for across the desert-stretch it lies,
Gleaming and cool beneath the mocking skies—
The sparkling lake; almost the feverish gaze
Can see its ripples through the silvery haze;
Almost the straining ear can hear the plash
As its light wavelets on the pebbled dash.

One desperate effort more, and then to lave
Parched lips and burning foreheads in the wave;
One desperate effort more, and at the brink
In agony of thankfulness to sink.
Where the great palm-trees by the waters stand,
And their cool shadows rest upon the sand.

Poor wretch! the treacherous vision lures him on,
Till, faith, and hope, and strength, and courage gone,
He falls and perishes, and leaves to life
This lesson: Arm ye for the present strife;
On no sweet future build a futile faith;
Do for each hour thy best. So armed for death.

—All the Year Round.

THE TWO SISTERS.

Mamie had been good for a whole month. Good in her lessons, good in her department, good in her Sunday-school lessons. And Aunt Sarah had promised a present to whichever of the little girls would be good for a whole month.

Phebe had tried for it, too. Phebe wanted a present as well as anyone. But Phebe was as wild and restless as Mamie was quiet and docile. She had played snowballing too long with the boys, and her geography lesson was marked "a failure" by Miss Kipp, the teacher.

"It ain't half so hard for Mamie to be good as it is for me," pouted she. "I did try. But the minute I forgot, everything went wrong, and I don't care. So there now. I almost hate Mamie! She'd no business to be better than I."

"Phebe, Phebe!" said her mother, "Do you know that you are encouraging a very wicked feeling?"

"It's better fun to be wicked than it is to be good," protested Phebe, stoutly, while Mamie stood by, with a distressed face, and large eyes full of sorrow that her sister could not have a present, too.

"I wanted a doll, awful bad," said Phebe. "Mine is all battered to pieces. But now I guess I'll have to dress up a corn doll."

"Such a naughty girl as you are don't deserve a doll, or anything else that is nice," said Aunt Sarah.

Phebe said nothing. She only pouted and kicked her foot against the bureau. She had really endeavored to be good for a little while, and this only made her defeat more bitter.

And on the day when Mamie was taken to the city to select her present—for Aunt Sarah had said that the lucky little girl should select whatever she most preferred out of a whole toy-shop—Phebe went down to the brook and flung stones at the fishes and cried as if her heart would break.

"I guess I'll drown myself," said Phebe, wiping away her tears. "Would'nt they all feel bad when supper time came, and no Phebe. Mamma would be sorry then that she said I was wicked."

Phebe leaned over and looked at the cold, glittering water that flowed past so swiftly between the frozen shores, and finally decided that it was rather too cold weather to drown herself. Besides she was hungry. So she went back sullenly to her home.

"Phebe," said her mother, "what have you been doing with yourself all the morning?"

"Nothing," answered Phebe.

"Have you practiced your music lesson?"

"No," with a pout.

"Very well," said Mrs. Jones. "Then go to the piano and practice a half-hour before you can have any lunch."

At this Phebe slammed the door so violently and pounded the piano so hard that her mother sent to tell her that she should have nothing for her lunch.

"I wish now that I had drowned myself," said Phebe, as the tears of disappointment and anger rolled down her cheeks.

Mamie, in the meantime, was enjoying herself immensely. Aunt Sarah took her, first of all, to a restaurant, where all the windows were full of plants, and the birds sang overhead, and a great musical-box played the sweetest tunes that ever were heard. And they had roast fowl, and cabinet pudding, and some ice cream. And then they betook themselves to a toy shop, the like of which Mamie had never seen in her life before.

Mamie could not at first make up her mind in the midst of all these temptations. First she thought she would have a woolly goat with a blue ribbon around its neck, and the most lifelike of "Baa—aa—aas," because the baby could play with it.

"But the present is for you, not for the baby," said Aunt Sarah, laughing.

And then Mamie stood fascinated before a little velocipede which would just suit Harry, her other little brother, she thought.

"Velocipedes are not playthings for little girls," said Aunt Sarah. "No, no—keep to the feminine toys."

"Well, then," said Mamie, with a long sigh, "what would you have if you were me?"

"What do you say to a doll?" said Aunt Sarah.

Mamie's eyes sparkled.

"Yes," said Mamie, "I should enjoy a doll. But there are so many dolls. Please, Aunt Sarah, you pick one out for me."

Aunt Sarah pointed with her finger to a French beauty with a blue satin bonnet, and a dress of tulle, all puffed up with narrow blue bows. Blue cardrops were in her ears, and she wore beautiful blue kid slippers and silk stockings, while a tiny fan hung suspended from her waist like any court beauty.

"Oh, oh!" cried Mamie. "What a lovely doll! But it will cost too much, I am afraid."

"Twenty-five shillings, ma'am," said the smiling shopman.

"Put it in a neat box," said Aunt Sarah. "And now, my dear, I want you to sit here and wait patiently for about half an hour, while I go into the milliner's shop next door."

While Mamie was having such a delightful time, Phebe was fighting a hard battle with herself at home. She had made up her mind finally to try to be a good girl. She had gone voluntarily and asked her mother's pardon for her ill temper—she had faithfully practiced her music and studied her lessons, and now she was amusing the baby by building little houses of blocks, and letting him knock them all down with his chubby fat fists.

In spite, however, of her good resolutions, Phebe felt a little rankling bitterness in her heart when she heard the carriage wheels coming up to the front door.

"But I won't be spiteful," said she. "I will go and look at Mamie's present and be glad because she is glad."

So she left the baby, who was now fast asleep in his little cradle, and ran down stairs. There was Mamie, with both arms full of bundles, standing, smiling, on the threshold. She ran to meet her.

"Oh, Mamie," she cried, "what have you bought?"

"Guess," said Mamie, joyfully.

"A doll!"

"Yes," said Mamie. "Come and look at it."

Both the girls ran to the hall table and opened the biggest box.

There, side by side, lay two pretty, black-eyed, curly headed maidens, so near alike that one could hardly tell them apart, in pink merino dresses, with black silk sashes, and pink bead necklaces.

"Oh," cried Phebe, clapping her hands, "there are two!"

"Yes," said Mamie. "Their names are Lucetta and Lucilla. And one is my doll-daughter and the other is yours."

"Mine!" cried Phebe, scarcely believing her own ears.

"Yes," said Mamie. "Dear Phebe, you don't suppose I could enjoy playing with my new doll if you didn't have one, too?"

For, while Aunt Sarah had been selecting a bonnet in the milliner's shop, Mamie had seen these lovely wax twins, and learning that the price of both was the same as that asked for the French beauty, had decided in their favor.

"Because, Aunt Sarah," she had pleaded, "I would be much happier if Phebe and I could each have one."

"Very well," Aunt Sarah had said. "Spend the money as you please."

And that night, when the little girls were together in their bed, each with a doll clasped close to her heart, Phebe told Mamie the history of her day's troubles.

"But I did make up my mind at last to be good," said she. "And doesn't it seem as if Lucetta' came just to reward me for it?"

"Yes, it does," said Mamie.

And it would be difficult to tell which of the two was happiest.

NEWS FROM QUEENSLAND.

An Australian's Views of Canada—Hard Times at the Antipodes Interesting Facts.

Mr. H. G. Haig, of Townsville, Queensland, Australia, is visiting Canada. He said that already in some districts the drought had been so severe as to drive flocks of plain turkeys in search of water into parts where they had never been seen by "the oldest inhabitant." The consequence of this scarcity of water was that the sheep were dying by the thousands, and the loss to the farmers was likely to be very heavy. Most of the farming in Queensland was of sheep, but for about three hundred miles from the coast the grass was too rank and luxuriant for them, and so cattle were raised there. There were a few scattered farms of arable land where wheat and maise were raised, and these were mostly in the hands of Germans. Land was taken up in selected lots from the Government, payment being extended over a period of ten years, and the prices varying from fifteen shillings ($3.75) to thirty shillings ($7.50) per acre. The class who generally were the farm laborers or men who were used to country life; they had the best chance of success, especially if they possessed a little capital and could afford to buy a plot of land. Building was expensive, and consequently house rent was very high, a small house suitable for a banker's or merchant's clerk, with a wife and small family, was let at about $5 to $6.50 per week, while a four-roomed cottage, such as a working man would live in, rented at from $2.50 to $3.75 per week. Laborers' wages were from $1.75 to $2 per day, but those on the wharves (lumpers was their local name) earned about $2.80. Business in Australia generally was depressed, and in Sydney about 2,000 workmen out of employment were holding mass meetings in the parks and endeavoring to obtain relief work. Manufacturing was only carried on to a very small degree and only to supply local and immediate wants, there being such establishments as foundries, soap works, breweries, etc., but they found it a good deal better in every way to import manufactured goods from England where there was a better chance for such industries than in a new country like theirs. Business had, however, been good latterly in spite of

DID THE REST IN AUSTRALIA

THE PRESENT TEMPORARY DEPRESSION.

This was proved by the fact that good building lots in Townsville and similar places had trebled in the last three years. There had also been a gradual increase in the mining industry, the output of gold, lead and other minerals having steadily advanced in the last few years. Sugar planting has also proved very successful in North Queensland (which lies four degrees from the tropics), having been introduced there about fifteen years ago. During the last three years the business has been fully developed and first class machinery was now employed. A difficulty was looming in the near future and that was the labor question. The plantations had been worked by laborers from the South Sea Islands, but now the Chinese were coming in. It was anticipated that an importation of coolie laborers from India would be arranged, otherwise the sugar planters would soon be in difficulty.

Brutality in Russia.

A sensational trial was concluded at Moscow a few days ago, resulting in a sentence of deportation to Siberia against a woman named Bulakh for keeping a rich orphan girl of whom she had charge as governess, in a state of wretched confinement and semi-starvation for nearly thirty years, in order to obtain possession of her fortune of £40,000. Bulakh was governess to Mazurin, the girl, in the house of the latter's grandmother in Moscow. Under fear of being forced into an unhappy union, and through various pretexts invented by Bulakh, the girl was induced to run away with her scheming governess to the town of Rejeff, where, by dint of religious terrorism and exhortations to take the veil, the weak-minded though accomplished pupil was gradually reduced to a state of helpless imbecility. The girl, now a woman of 40, was at times brought so low that she ate pieces of the firewood brought into her room.

Having reduced her to a state of drivelling idiocy, and got hold of her money, Bulakh then did all she could to persuade her victim to commit suicide. As to Bulakh herself, she lived well, built almshouses and helped her two sons to become rich. The strangest part of the story is that the governor and the society of Rejeff, to whom the truth of the case had been more or less evident for several years, should so long have regarded the crime of Bulakh with indifference. The poor victim Mazurin was not in a condition to be brought into court. Bulakh's only defence seems to have been that the accusation was a conspiracy against her, and that Mazurin had always been insane. She has given notice of appeal, and has been set at liberty on bail for 200,000 roubles.—St. Petersburg Dispatch.

THE ODESSA STAGE UPSETS.

An Excitement Caused on Saturday Afternoon—No Persons Seriously Hurt.

On Saturday afternoon, shortly after 3 o'clock, the lumbering Odessa stage, driven by Mr. Parks, rounded the corner of King and Princess streets. The horses were going along at an easy jog, but the wheels caught in the railway track, the stage gave a lurch and over it went on its side in the middle of the road. People who saw the accident rushed forward and helped out the passengers, one man, two women and several children. The women and children were hurried into Dr. Sullivan's surgery, while a half dozen men and two policemen straightened up the stage and unhitched the horses. One of the axles was broken, and a barrel of whiskey was used to prop the stage up.

The parties in the stage were Capt. Burnett, of the Loughboro troop of cavalry: Mrs. Pollitt, of Odessa, and her two children, and Mrs. Wm. Kizer, of Cataraqui, and three children. Mrs. Kizer held a child in her arms, Capt. Burnett another, and Mrs. Pollitt a third. There was a barrel of sugar inside the stage with the passengers, and Capt. Burnett had just remarked upon the unsafety of the arrangement when the stage capsized. There was a sprawling of people, and on the leg of little Madeline Kizer, a four-year-old, the barrel of sugar rolled. The women cried and Mrs. Kizer tried to shove the upper side of the stage off and failed. Capt. Burnett had his senses about him and lifted the sugar barrel off the child. Mrs. Kiser was terribly excited when taken to Dr. Sullivan's, and reasonably so. Her little girl had her arm scraped badly, but it was neatly bound up. Mrs. Pollitt had her elbow injured, not seriously. The escapes were miraculous. Later on another vehicle carried the people homeward.

MURDER IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

A Lennox County Man Killed by an Indian on the Skeena River.

By the arrival of the steamer Otter yesterday afternoon from Skeena river and way ports news was received that on the 6th inst., Amos Card Yeomans, a native of County Lennox, Ontario, aged about 40, the principal white trader between the villages of Kitsilass and Kispihooks, was murdered by an Indian of the tribe resident there. The difficulty, as related by an Indian, who arrived on board the steamer, to Mr. J. J. Hart, of the firm of Hart & Isaacs, Johnson street, is to the effect that Yeomans, some time ago, was crossing Skeena river in a canoe. He had with him two Indian boys. The river was rough, skokum chuck, and by accident the canoe capsized. The boys were drowned, but Yeomans managed to save his own life.

He had ordered goods for the Indian trade on the Skeena river at his station at the head of canoe navigation beyond the big canyon of the river. There he met the father of the boys. A conference took place as to the proper settlement for the loss of life. The "old man" demanded money or blankets as a potlach. To this Yeomans demurred. An Indian woman standing near advised Yeomans to settle the case in some manner, but Yeomans refusing, the Indian drew a knive, and according to Mr. J. J. Hart's informant, plunged the blade through Yeomans' jugular vein below the left ear and death was instantaneous. Officer Walter Hough of the city police force, received a letter dated "May 26th, 1884," at Skeena river from Yeomans, who stated that at that time the nearest white man to him was S. Peirre. The white inhabitants fear further trouble from the occurrence and are fleeing to the sea-board. Yeomans' place of trade was about 200 yards from the bank of the Skeena. He was a married man and leaves four children behind him. The case is one which demands the immediate attention of the Federal Government. Yeomans was the passenger who was robbed of nuggets on board the steamer Otter, and the steward Miller, and the cabin boy Patsy Madden were indicted for larceny at the Assizes held there in the summer of 1883.—Victoria Standard, June 21.

COUSINS AS RIVALS IN LOVE.

One Found Dying in the Road and the Other Accused of the Murder.

Olean, July 5.—Officers from Clarion county are searching through the northern oil fields for Frederick Galbraith, who is believed to have caused the death of his cousin. The latter was found lying by the roadside with a fractured skull. He said that a horse had run away with him. It was not until several days later that it became known that he and his cousin had quarrelled over a young woman for whose favour they were rivals. His body was exhumed. Besides the crushed skull it was found that he was injured about the abdomen, and that three ribs were broken. Before his death his cousin told him that he would "smash his head in if he ever saw him with the girl again." The Coroner's jury charged the death of Frederick Galbraith on his cousin, and a warrant was issued for his arrest.

NEVEILLE, THE BIGAMIST.

Indicted by the Grand Jury—Some Pitiful Wives on the List.

Toledo, July 5.—Neveille, the bigamist, has been indicted by the Grand Jury at Toledo on two counts—bigamy and conspiracy. George W. Moore and C. J. Whitney, of Detroit, Rev. A. L. Brice, of Newark, N.J., and Justice Scott and Judge Sherwood, of Toledo, were the witnesses who appeared against him. Mr. Brice is the minister who married Neveille in 1882 after his divorce from the first woman he married in Canada and was summoned to identify the much-married man. Mr. Moore says Neveille is already credited with fifteen wives, and there are several States yet to hear from. His first matrimonial experience was at Sydenham, county of Frontenac.
