"Who was found?" she said, opening her eyes only to see the man vanish, then rubbed her eyes and looked at Nan. "The chair is so comfortable," she said, "and I couldn't sleep last night—but I was not dozing off when you came in. I was thinking about mother—and father—and how he must

"Yes, Miss," said Nan, who knew "Yes, Miss." said Nan, who knew every detail of a certain night's work by heart, and could not bear to see the girl sitting there, "but such thoughts ain't for a bright day like this; and if you'll come with me (for I'm vastly afraid of them woods), we'll fetch the things you took out to the beggar-man—leastways, if there's any left."

"No," said Madcap, jumping up; "I won't go to the cowslip gate to-day—if won't go to the cowslip gate to-day—if you are frightened, take Saunders-I'm going to my poor people."

"Anywhere out of here," thought Nan, as she followed the girl, and brought her hat and gloves—last of all her basket, into which Madcap looked with a sudden thought; then turned it upside down, but nothing fell out. "And I picked such a lot," she said, absently. "They could not all have tumbled out. Has anybody touched it since I came home, yesterday?" she added, turning to Nan.

"Nobody, Miss," said Nan, who was a little offended at this rejection of the tremendous sacrifice her offer had implied; "you brought it in on your arm just as it is now, you mostly brings it

But it was not empty when she start-ed, ten minutes later, for her village, in which tongues were wagging and heads nodding to an extent unprece-dented within these twelve years. "Les absens ont toujours tort," and Mr. Eyre was to be no exception to the rule. He had been gone barely a week, yet already whispers of his errand were abroad; and now that the grasp of the stern hand which had held all his world in check was relaxed, he suffered the usual fate at the hands of those whose service rested less on love than fear. Some of the gossipers saw her coming down the hill; saw how half-way she turned back to look at the gray old house that had cradled her so happily. was beautiful, and the lurid flames that seemed to rise behind it as the sun set brought no fear to her mind, though often strangers passing through the vil-lage would pause and attract attention to the seemingly burning house. Mad cap could not have told the precise point when her first faint doubt, dread as death, of her father became confirm ed by this visit to the village. All wel comed her eagerly, as usual (worshiping the two Madcaps in one), took her generous dole with loving thanks, tole her of their joys or woes; but one thing struck her curiously, and it was this: that no one either mentioned, or inquired for, her father. Yet never be-fore had lip-service failed him; perhaps the thought that his shadow might cross the threshold immediately after his daughter's prompted those respect-ful inquiries for him that she had accepted as willing tribute to his good-This silence effected what mere gossip or innuendo could not have done, and the crowning sadness was laid upon her heavy heart in Synge-lane, where she paused to leave one of those little gifts that she brought from time to time. The woulan who had received Mr Eyre so curtly smiled a welcome to not for the sake of her gift, but for her-

CHAPTER VI. Madcap sat on the top of a new-mown haycock-sat on the exact spot that her mother had filled sixteen years agoand surveyed her kingdom through eyes that had been curiously strengthened during the past three weeks. For hours she had watched the summer seas of grass sink gently to the mowers' scythes, caught a thousand faint vernal scents as they were scattered, but wearied at last of the flavor of melitot and clover, that out-scented all the rest. Then shook her head, and thought how lonely that gorgeous queen must have been, for who ever heard of her husband; or if a maiden, what did she king, who surely had wives enow?

go gadding abroad with gifts to the old Yes, that had been the keystone of been intensely lonely at odd moments in the midst of all her splendor, and She had enjoyed an uninterrupted month of her own company, and was as sick of it as if it had been the worst in the world; was tired even of her books, and each day and hour felt more keenly that hankering after congenial society that is the strongest impulse implanted in the human breast. O! for a good rousing boisteringmatch with the boys, she thought (such events being by no means uncommon. even since her lengthened frocks), or game at snowballs, in which she was a match for the pair-anything but this dull, dread calm, broken only by the more than one head was shaken as presently she moved away. "She's over young to be left the said one of the women, looking after her: "and all the frolic's gone out of her feet since Master went. She'll aye find it main lonesome up at t' Red

"There's trouble upon her," said another woman, sighing. "He's busted out again, and means mischief. And its ill work rousing sleepings dogs. He'd have done better to bide at home. Seems like yesterday the other young missus were sitting there"-and the speaker pointed to the distant haycock —"and Master fired over her head at Hester, who 'dventured to peep over hedge; and says he to his wife, with his arms round her, 'After all, 'tis only a a rook!' Just so, as if he'd just missed murder. What a man-what a man Ay, if he never came back it might be best, in the end, for she." "Of she'll be happy enough when the oung Lord takes her home," said a third and younger voice. "She's naught to be pitied with so many as there be to love her—it's just her mother over again, not a soul to be looked at so long as the young missus is nigh," and the young matron tossed her handsome head almost as high as she tossed her

(since there was no Job beyond) during the past month, and since last she came the hay in it had been carried, leaving but close-cropped stubble that smelled to her healthly sweet after the overpowering fragrance of the "Ten Acre."

Half-way across it, she looked toward the cowslip gate. Surely some one was standing there; some one upon whom she had mused and thought much during the past weeks, and whom she would rejoice to see again?

She ran forward quickly, but the sun must have deceived her, for when she got to the gate not a soul was within sight, and as she stepped into the shad-

Davenport, Esq., 33 Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, London, Dear Sir,—We embrace this opportunity of congratulating you upon the wide-spread reputation this justly esteemed medicine, Dr. J. Collis Browne's Chlorodyne, has earned for itself, not only in Rindostan, but all over the East. As a remedy of general utility we must question whether a better is imported into the country, and we shall be glad to hear of its finding a place in every Angle-Indian home. The other brands, we are happy to say, are now relegated to the native bazaara, and judging from their sale, we fancy that their sojourn there will be but evanescent. We could multiply instances addinguistum of the extraordinary efficacy of Dr. Collis Browne's Colorodyne in Diarrhora, and Dyantery, Spasma, Cramps, Neuralgis, the Vomiting of Pregnancy and as a general scalative, that have occurred under our personal observation during many years. In Cholera, Diarrhora, and by such remedies as are entirely free from power. We have never used any other form of this medicine than Collis Browne's, from a firm power we have never used any other form a sense of duty we swe to the profession and the public, as seare of the opinion that the substitution of any other than Collis Browne's is a continuant shaken of Fairs on The Chemist of Pharmacy Society of Great Britain His Excellency the Vicerov's Chemists.

As she stood, the nearest tree seemed to move, and a man advanced to her side. "Madcap—little friend," said a well-remembered voice, and in a moment her hand flew to his, and she cried "So you have come back—and I am so glad, so very glad to see you! I have recollected a hundred questions that I forgot to ask you about Frank!"

He let her hand go, a shade of trouble of the state of ble or disappointment flitting across the new brightness of his face, then said, a little wearily; "Yes-we will talk about him presently-but first will you now show me some portion of these woods that you

"Yes-I will show you," she said, joyously, and still a little bewildered by her own satisfaction at seeing him, so that she forgot his last words to her when they had parted at the cowslip gate, and how it was no friend of her father's that she welcomed so eagerly. "I could not show you one tithe of them in a week," she said, as, walking on air, she moved beside him; "but I will take you first to a haunt of my own, not too far from the cowslip gate for me to run to for even ten minutes at a time, nor so near that anyone can find me if I have a mind to hide?" and she walked on tiptoe, and put one finger, as she brought him soon into a little lovely hollow, where the sylvan flowers lingered longest, and whence innumerable glades—glades mingling with the broken woodland—made new vistas of eternal beauty; while a natural throne of velvet at the foot of a giant beech commanded all. Madcap sprang lightly to her welloved seat, laid one hand on the great noss-covered roots that stretched high above the sward, leaned her shoulder to the moss-grown bole at her back, then sprang up, and would have stepped down into the hollow where the stranger stood, but that he came to meet her, begging her to stay.
