They might have been King and Queen as seen from the end of one of those long vistas beyond; a thousand eyes might unsuspected have watched them, a thousand ears have harkened to their talk; but, you see, Madcap was used to sitting there alone, and she loved the many loop-holes of her outlook, that enabled her to steal away silently at the slightest sign or sound of pursuit. The green chair was big; it might have held four Madeaps, though scarcely two Colonel Busbys.

"Hark!" she said, holding up her finger; "do you hear that-like the whetting of a saw? And it is only the titmouse, and the little imposter has only those two notes with which to

"What can I tell you?" she said, looking dreamily out; "have you not seen it all before-anything that I could tell you-but with young eyes? only I wish you could see these woods in spring, when you have to pick your steps so "And yet," he said, "you step so lightly; like Ellen-

"E'en the light harebell raised its head Elastic from her airy tread. "Oh, no!" she said. "That is a poetic conceit; and, besides, she would have stopped to pick some . . . and when have filled my lap, somehow I feel as it I had been taking lives they grow so tall and straight and happy, and open their eyes much as we do; and they are set just where it is best for them, and last so many happy days in shine and shadeit seems just a selfish whim to put them in water for a day or two, then throw them away for new favorites. "So she is faithful," thought the stranger; "and so was her mother-with one exception. "Boys don't understand these things as girls do," she said, sighing. "Doune s always in the classics, and Gordon doesn't know a blue bell from a hyacinth, and loves his boating and cricket; he would bowl just as hard over cowslips' heads as over a-shaved meadow; and I can almost fancy him settling down as you said Frank would, and getting a little bald and stout. Poor Geor-

But her heart reproached her as she said the words; and she looked up quickly at the stranger. "Don't think that I am blaming him," she said. "I love him dearly; it is because he is so good that we have

"He is a genius," said Madcap, proudly, but with a happy smile on her lips, "and, of course, he has no common-sense; but Gordon has plenty. So while I am not taking care of Doune, Gordon must." "Poor Gordon, indeed!" said the stranger under his breath; "the Lovel fate over again. "Did you speak?" she said, looking at him as if to seek a reason for the unaccountable delight his grave companionship gave her. "I am waiting for that lecture," he said, with the "blink" of sunshine that she remembered crossing his lips. "How long shall it be?" she said, falling into his humor, and wishing that her talk might soothe him to peace, for there were deeper lines of suffering on his face to-day than there had been a month ago.

"Half an hour-an hour," he said, "for I am not likely ever to sit here by your side again. I was in Lovel to-day on Job's business, little friend, but I could not keep away from the cowslip gate, and, by good luck, you came." "O! you will come back some day," she said, gently; "and you will go through it." She shrank a little, as one who unwittingly touches fire, as he looked away from her; his face suddenly grown stern, but yet more weary

Madcap had only a child's heart, strong and true (though she looked a woman), and she was used to Doune's dark hours, and longed to solace this one; but, before she could summon up courage to speak, he had turned to her, and for the third time demanded his "lecture."

"To begin with, then," said Madcap, on that instant, "both you and I are sitting in the embrace of a court beautv. who wears a velvet suit, slippers herself yet more delicately in moss, while her waistcoat is always of silver, even when in autumn she grows in pure russet-gold. The Lady Chestnut may get the better of her in the matter of bloom, but her outlines are clumsy, and over-ripe, beside that delicate beauty: and even the oaks cannot hold their own before her. . . . The stock-doves are all her lovers; you will see them folcoats for a mile through the woods. . they are their echoes, and caricature all their absurdities. Have you ever watch-low even a distant rustle of her petti-They follow no other so, for birds have finer tastes than human beings-though ed them?" she went on, quickly, content to talk so long as she could charm the sadness from his face. "I have listened to them," he said; "somehow I have never thought of birds except as singing or hungry."

"There is a life betwen the two," she said, looking-down her beloved glades, and speaking softly to herself. "There is marrying, building, rearing the young family. . . Have you ever seen a housemartin feed her young?" she said, a smile breaking through her thoughts as she looked at him. "First by some miracle she sets them all in a row on the top bar of some secluded gate. Then she forages, and skims back to feed each little one flying, and it is miraculous how cleverly and neatly the business is done on both sides, a pattern to our mothers if only they would take heed of it! And nearly all the birds are good parents; owls come back once in five minutes to look at their young, wrens once in two, swallows every second or third minute, and some of the others even oftener than that."

The stranger looked at Madcap keenly. Yes, here was the true mother's instinct beating in her young breast, the one crowning, womanly charm without which a woman is less flower than

"But they are not all good," she add ed, gravely, "a rayen deserts her young as soon as hatched, and none have ever been able to find out how it is fed—by dew? or worms bred in the nest? And some, O! but some of them have temif you happen to meet them when tak-ing their young out for a first walk, will pursue you along the hedge as you walk, snapping deflantly in your ears, and telling you as plainly as possible to get home . . . and there are rogues— the hen harriers who beat the fields of corn regularly like pointers or setter dogs . . . the ravens, who spend all their spare time in cuffing each other on the wing, frowned on by the solemn crows who fly in pairs all the year

"Have you found one who resembles me?" said the stranger, long ago roused out of his thoughts, and turned side-ways in his moss-grown elbow-chair to look at her.

"Perhaps," she said, a little sadly, "for long ago I found one for Doune—the gold-crested wren, who will not mingle with crowds, but holds aloof in fields and woods, and surves because he can suffer, but cannot brook pity.

Then there is the crow," she said, in a brighter tone, "who swaggers in his walk, and is Colonel Busby's double; and the daw is Mr. Busby, with only half his walk (he would never permit more); and the magnies and the jays. more); and the magpies and the jays
