among the birds," he said. "Well—I have found one for you—you are a swallow, for your walk is like the flight of one, but your voice is like the blackcap's, and I am beginning to suspect you of possessing the owl's wisdom—" "Silly swallow, prating thing," quoted Madcap, laughing; "yes, that suits me very well. But I do not like the owl he is my only enemy in all the wood. He can scream, snore, scold, and hiss like a thousand snakes, all in less than a minute, but I love the deep and solemn notes he sometimes uses, and that makes the forest re-echo for mirtes!" "But surely you never come here at night alone?" he said, thoroughly start-

"O! yes, often," she said; "if I cannot sleep or anything has vexed me, and by moonlight it is far more exquisite than by day. . . Have you ever studied the moonlight flowers?" she went on, looking at him wistfully; "they are all so pale, so weird, as if the moon had looked into all their pretty faces one by one. ed into all their pretty faces one by one, and made them scared and still like herself . . . their very scent is faint and ghostly as in a dream. . . Sometimes I find a rabbit sitting upon my chair and washing his face, sometimes as I sit quite still, one or another of the night animals run across my knee, and

I get all sorts of queer peeps into the creature's habits, for it is in the night only that the smaller forest animals 'It is not right for a young thing like you to be wandering here alone at night," said the stranger, frowning.

Of yes," she said, laughing; "there is Nan-but she is terrified of these woods even by day, and no earthly powers would draw her here after night-

"And you say no one at home knows of this haunt of yours," he went on, in a dissatisfied tone. "Supposing you fell ill here-or were robbed and murdered by some stranger or footpad?" "I wear noornaments," she said, "and strangers and footpads never com

"Am not I a stranger?" he said, looking at her keenly.
"No," she said, stoutly; "you were mother's friend and Job's—and Frank's, and you will tell me all about yourself some day-for I must be going back to my hay now.

"Yes." he said, looking at her eagerly, yearningly, as a man may at something he knows to be forbidden to him, but that soon will have passed beyond the reach of his power to behold it, yet the present was his, he would beat out his little span of joy to its utmost limit. . . Had he by hard longing (for surely ntense wishing had brought her) sum moned her footsteps to the cowslip gate, only to let her go so quickly? "Let us make a bargain," he said; "give me another lecture-just a little one-and I'll tell you all about Frank and myself. The hay will do well enough without you. Tell me some-thing of the daylight life of these woods, and how you spend your hours in them. "How can I tell you?" said the girl.

"Men don't understand these things even father does not; and you would think I was tdling away my time when I am learning something new at every step. Anyone could learn the avenues in a day, but half a dozen miles of broken woodland are another matter, and there are such beautiful things outside the wood-in our own grounds, in the meadows, everywhere.' "Tell me of some of them," he pleaded, happy only so long as her young voice ran on. "I am going to settle down in the country myself before very long, and I expected to be dull; but your knowledge will help me."

"What can I tell you," she said, "if you have not lived among such things?

If you have never been caught in a thicket of blossomed thorn; never followed the plow and smelled the sweet, fresh earth; never watched a daisy hang all its petals downward at sunset, or a poppy fold its heart into a red cup at eve . . . never marked the little snowy half closed umbrellas made by the wind-flowers, or seen the light glisten-ing at sunset on a field of spiders' webs, perial bridges tossed from blade to blade of grass, and stronger than any made by human hands, since the heaviest footfall will not break them.

"No," he said, as she paused, and he saw that she had forgotten him in her thoughts; "I have seen none of these things: but I will look for them all some "There is always some new delight, she went on, softly, as if to herself;

"some lovely accident, as we think, but set there to help us to-Live more hearty as we pray. One day it may be a sunset to startle one into a real understanding of heaven another it will be a sheet of emerald grass shining through a row of tall poplars just budding brown . . . or it will be a carpet of blue anemones in January, when no other flower is abroad or seen, a field of tares and wheat sway to the breeze, scarlet in one light, gold in another . . . if you have never lost yourself in the sweetness of a bunch of clove pinks, and yet can catch the fra-grance of a checkered fritillaria—never seen a glow-worm crawl up a stalk of grass and hoist up lier little lamp as a signal to her mate-" She paused, and burst out laughing at herself. "O! what nonsense I am talking," she said. "As if a soldier could be expected to know or care anything of such matters. But it has been a great relief to me to say it, all the same," she added, nodding; "and I am very much obliged to you, indeed, for listening to me." "I shall remember it all," he said;

and thought how he need not fear for her, since she had real religion—the re-ligion of a beautiful fearless life, that beat in entire harmony with works of her Creator. "Have you ever tried to write down your thoughts? Your fath-er was a celebrated writer in his youth." "No," she said, slowly, "I have never tried; and think I never shall. But if I had tried to write, do you know how it would have ended? I should have gone on trying all my life; and when I had become quite old, I should have called my friends together and asked them to hear the fruits of my labors. They would all cry out, 'But it is centuries old!' And I would say, 'Yes, it is the last chapter of the Book of Ecclesias tics; but it has my soul, my best efforts, in it; and I have no better,"

"You have chosen a sad form of ex-pression, child," he said, struck by the polemy stillness of her voice and look. "Are not the young sad?" she said. 'Or why does one's heart ache in spring, when older people cannot tell it from early summer? I think it must be because our suffering is before us; their's is behind them." "Why must you suffer?" he said, his heart sinking as he looked at her. "God forbid that you should—"
"Why should I not?" she said, looking at him gravely. "It is the lot of all; and the happiest, the best beloved, are always those who suffer most." "Where did you learn all this?" he said, hardly knowing whether to be glad or sorry that the young eyes looking out on life were so clear. "Perhaps out of my own heart," she said; "perhaps out of the village; perhaps out of my Book of Ecclesiastes.

"Yes, she is happy now," he said, as one whose thoughts were not in his words; "we are going to settle down to-gether in the country next month. I was always a bad correspondent; and she thought—" "That you must be dead," said Mad-cap, sighing; "but it was poor Frank

"What on earth is the link between him and me?" said the soldier, a flush something that looked like anger rising to his tanned brow. "Everywhere I am received for him, taken for a dull echo of him-a makeshift that bears some faded resemblance to the dead hero. I'm positively sick of hearing myself called Lovel, and being clap-ped on the shoulder every time I venture to go to my club by some man who yows he used to know me in another

"But was there any resemblance between you?" said Madcap, sitting erect, and understanding Job's mistake bet-

"There was the likeness that may exist between two fair men of exactly the same height and build," he said, carelessly, "though I never saw it myself. Men dropped like flies in those days, and looked less in each other's faces than at the enemy; but our supposed resemblance was a matter of common remark in the regiment, Then the circumstances of our joining were al-mest identical; both had sold out of the guards, both had applied for leave of service in the war at the same time, and both for the same reason (though only they two knew it)-a bad heartache of some years' standing. So for the short time we fought together we were friends, and when one died the other must needs be received as his own ghost. It was the commonplace pose," said Major Methuen, still with that angry flush on his brow; "but how order of our looks that did it, I men in their senses can pretend to re-cognize in middle age one out of a pair of yellow-haired boys, I can't imagine. There never was an uncommon line in either of our faces; there are hundreds like us to be met with in the streets any

"Are there?" said Madcap, a little coldly at this underrating of Frank. "I have always heard very differently . . . but I see that you never really likedhim or knew how to value him. "Did I not?" he said with a queer smile; "yet we were friends enough to have no s crets from each other (save one, an I that concerned a woman), and on the eve of battle we exchanged '-he paused abruptly, and said no more. "Frank was not a lad when he died, said Madcap; "he was nearly toontyseren-six years older than Gordon. Perhaps you were older-though you need not be so very glad of that now," she added, looking round at him with a little feminine touch of spite that even an angel will indulge in if you disparage her patron saint. But he only smiled, and she laughed, so that peace was restored between them, though her next question endangered it. "Pray," said she, "were both your heartaches for one and the same per-

She was looking at him earnestly, as though by his reply she might find the key to an enigma that puzzled her. "Why do you ask that?" he said, his eyes steady, though his color changed. "Because Job told me once that Frank loved my mother," she said, resting her cheek on one hand and looking at him thoughtfully; "but she loved father best -and, of course, she married him. Did you love her, too; and is that when you speak of her so tenderly, and love me?" "So you know I love you, child," he said, turning to her swiftly. "God bless you for saying that-yes, I did love her; and I lost her only to find her once more

-and once more-to lose her." "No, not lost," she said. "I will love you for my mother's sake and my own . . . and you will forgive father; if he wronged you it was unwittingly-" But he had started up, she sat alone on her green throne, and he was standing below in the green hollow gazing almost magically. approach. "Good-by, little one-little child," he said, turning to her suddenly, as she stood half-longing, half-tearing to descend, and she saw in his eyes the look, the tears that she had surprised in them once before; "only one thing could ever bring me back, you being in trouble, which, please God, you never will be. "Good-by," she said, gently, asking no questions, as some children and women will, God knows, and vex a man's soul even while he loves them, but when he reached up and took her slender hand, she laid her other over it, and held it fast.

For a moment the strong man bowed his head on them, "If I might stay," she thought she heard him say; but in another moment, and with no further leave-taking, she was standing alone above the hollow, and she could not see which way he went for tears . . . and then (for her child's heart has gone out to him) she sat down and cried-cried, not knowing it, for the peace that had fled away with him for ever, but should Bitters occasionally.
