street, hidden somewhere in the densely populated district between the Boulevard St. Michel and the Rue des Saints Peres. It is near the Quaides Augustins, which makes a pleasant promenade for its inhabitants on summer evenings, near the river, within sight of the mighty towers of Notre Dame, within sound of her deep-toned belis. It is near the Morgue, and not very far from the hospitals; near the flower-market; near much that is central and busy, closely hemmed round with the teeming life of the workaday world of Paris; but very far from the haunts of pleasure, from the famous restaurants, from clubs and cafes, from parks and parterres, from opera-house and

It is a narrow street-crooked too-and the houses are of the shabbiest. In one of these houses, a house which lay back from the street, and, with three others, formed a stony quadrangle, enclosing a little yard, dwelt Rose and Kathleen O'Hara, two sisters of Irish parentage, the daughters of a poor Irish gentleman, who had come here from the good city of Bruges in Flanders, just twelve years ago, and had occupied the same little apartment on the third story ever since. Just nineteen years ago Captain O'Hara was living with a young second wife and a seven-year-old daughter, the issue of his first marriage, in the city of Brussels. He had been in the army, in the 87th Irish Fusileers, had run through his little patrimony, and had sold his commission, and All branches of undertaking attended to. Has were full of brightness and music in the balmy eventides of July. The young wife was looking forward tremblingly, yet hopefully, to the cares and joys of maternity. The dark-eyed stepdaughter adored her. Too young to remember her own mother, who had died in Bengal, where the girl was born, the child idolised the Captain's fairhaired wife, and was fondly loved by her in return. Never was there a happier family group than these three, and when the expected baby should come, it was to be a boy, the Captain declared in the pride of his heart; a son and heir-heir to empty pockets, wasted opportunities, bankruptcy, and gaol. He was pining for a son to perpetuate the noble race of O'Hara. The baby was to be christened Patrick, after some famous Patrick O'Hara of days gone by, the age of war and chivalry, and poetry and pride, when that day. He lived to see Kathleen alovely roamed from foreign town to town, living anywhere for convenience or cheapness. He spent six months at Brest, a year in Jersey, the two girls with him everywhere, Rose from the arms of her Indian ayah, and had followed the Captain's fortunes ever since. where, and there was no stint of bread and butter, and milk and eggs. The children wanted nothing better. But it was a dismal change for them when their father carried them back to Belgium, and established them in a stony street in Bruges, where the peaked roofs of the opposite houses seemed to shut out the sun, and where, instead of the sweet odors of sea and seaweed, there was an everlasting steneh of dried fish and

It was winter by this time, and it seemed to be the winter of their lives. Kathleen cried for the sea and the flowers of sunny Jersey. She could hardly be made to understand that summer was only a happy interval in the year, and that flowers do not grow in the stony streets of a city. The days the children, whom he loved fondly enough after his manner, were dependent on Biddy Ryan for happiness; and the faithful soul did her utmost to cheer and amuse them in their loneliness. She told them her fairy stories, the legends of her native Kerry; she described the green hills and purple mountains, the lakes, the glens and gorges, the islands and groves and abbeys, of that romantic country; until Rose, who had seen but little of the grandeur and glory of earth, longed with a passionate longing for that land of lake and mountain, which was in somewise her own land, inasmuch as her father had been born and bred within a few miles of Killarney.

Nothing could have been more honorable or less prudent than either marriage; and now he was living from hand to mouth in furnished lodgings in Brussels, writing a little for the English newspapers, getting a little help now and then from his own fami ly, and now and then a ten-pound note from a wealthy maiden aunt of his wife's-the aunt from whose handsome house in the Circus, Bath, pretty Kathleen Reilly had run away with her handsome Captain. The R. McFAUL, aunt had not forgiven or taken her back to favor; but she sent a little help occasional-

Captain O'Hara and his wife were not unhappy, in spite of their precarious fortunes, It was summer, and the scent of the lime blossom was in the air of the park and the boulevards; the lamplit streets and cafes

Ireland had not yet yielded her sweetness Alas for the unborn child on whom such hopes had been founded, such dreams had been dreamt! The fatal day of birth came, and the child was a girl; and before the wailing infant was six days old the young fair mother, with the rippling golden hair and innocent blue eyes, was lying in her coffin, strewn with white lilies and roses, and all the purest flowers of summer-tide. The brave young heart, which had never flinched or faltered at poverty or trouble

Captain O'Hara never looked the world or his difficulties bravely in the face after man from the day of his wife's death. He nursed and cared for by Bridget Ryan, the faithful Irish mald-servant who had taken
