MISCELLANEOUS READING.

"A paper on the "Fertilization of Flowers," read before the Albany Infertilization of flowers, he said, consists in the application of the proper pollen to their stigmas and the consequent transfer of the police contents to the young seed-cells or ovules. It involves two processes; first, the transportation of the pollen from the anthers, where it is produced, to the stigmas; second its germination on the stigmas and the transfer of the pollen contents, by means of the growing pollen tube to the ovules, which otherwise would not develop and form seeds. The first process is accomplished by various agents, but especially by winds and insects. The former carry most of the pollen of grasses and cereals and of many of our forest trees, and generally of such plants as have small, inconspicuous flowers with numerous anthers and an abundance of polien. The latter carry the pollen of those flowers that are highly colored or fragrant and that secrete nectar, which with the pollen is the natural food of many insects and the bait that allures them and the reward they receive for their services. There are two kinds of fertilization:

self-fertilization, in which the same plant produces both the pollen and the stigma to which it is applied, and dross-fertilization, on which the two are produced on different plants of the A CURE GUARANTEED same species. The latter, as a rule, is much better for the progeny of the plant than the former, and there are many special and curious structural contrivances in flowers by which it is favored and secured even in cases where both pollen and stigma are produced in one and the same flower. Even many floral structures, which at first sight appear admirably adapted to secure self-fertilization, are found by closer investigation to be ingenious arrangements for insuring cross fertilization. Examples of these various structures were noticed and illustrated by diagrams. Yet notwithstanding the evident designs in so many instances to bring about self-fertilization, selffertilization is in many flowers allowed and in some clearly designed, as if instiled free of gostage, on receipt of money, by address— nature was intent on the preservation lng MACK'S MAGNETIC MEDICINE CO. A knowledge of this subject adds much to the interest with which we study flowers and gives to their endless variation in structure, form, color and appendages a meaning and a significance which they would not otherwise have. It enables us to explain many phenomena in variation, fruitage and sterility which would otherwise be inexplicable. It gives to the horticulturist and the florist power to secure and render permanent and desirable variety of his cultivated plants, to improve poor or undesirable varieties and even to originate new varieties by resorting to a judicious system of fertilization. It is also necessary for those who raise ments will be likely to result in a failness of vision, premature old age, and manyother die ure of the variety to "come true to eases that lead to insanity or communities and a pre seed" and will occasion sore disap-Full particulars in our pamphlet, which we desire to send tree by mail to every one. The Drift Toward Cities.

No development of modern civili tion is more striking or significant than the steady drift of population from the acteristic of any one nation or race. With so few exceptions that they only establish the rule, it holds true to the civilized world.

A recent report by consul Ryder, of Copenhagen, calls attention to this feature of the last Danish census. The kingdom contains 1,980,257 inhabitants, which is an increase of 185,526 over the census of ten years By far the largest proportional gain Copenhagen having grown at the an-1858, hual rate of 2.62 per cent. during the All branches of undertaking attended to. Has last decade. The provincial towns throughout the country show uniformly large gains, while the growth of the rural districts was slower than ever before, being only 6.1 per cent. for the ten years, as against 9.7 per cent. in the first decade of the century. The result of this movement from country to town is seen in the smaller relative difference between the population of the rural districts and the cities than that which formerly existed. In 1840 Hangings, that which formerly existed. In 1840 the population of the rural districts was nearly four times that of all the cities. Now the ratio is only about 24
