About ninety miles from port a heavy gale blew from the southwest. The vessel was unable to carry any canvass except the peak of the mainsail. Her bow was kept well to the wind and she rode the gale all night, Murphy at the wheel. About midnight the Captain asked if the vessel was "kicking." He replied that he didn't think she was, but thought her cargo had shifted slightly. Three of. the crew were ordered to examine it. and found that its movement was very light. The vessel, however, shipped considerable water forward. On Thursday morning at 6:30 o'clock the pumps were brought into requisition, and an investigation was made. It was seen that 17 inches of water was in the hold and water came in faster than it was taken
